Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, one of the recent members of the Senate, when commiserated upon the fact that he was compelled to go to what is commonly known here as the amen corner, frankly said that any seat in the Senate was better than none; and so I suppose it might be said about the order of admission, that no matter in what order of precedence or priority a man is admitted here, it is better to come in on the floor than to be cooling his heels in the corridors.

There is a continuous importunity for admission upon the floor of the Senate. It is perhaps attributable to the very common desire among men to intrude themselves wherever they are not wanted. If there is any place or room or locality over which is placed a sign that this is intended exclusively for a certain class of people, for any reason whatever, that is the particular place where the average American wants to go, and he generally gets there. [Laughter.] This Chamber in its capacities and dimensions is not adequate to fulfill the desires of all those who would be pleased to be seated on this floor, and the Committee on Rules have been obliged to request a somewhat rigid enforcement of the regulations hitherto adopted, not because it is intended to stigmatize any person, not because there is a desire to exclude anybody from the privileges of the floor, but because the Chamber is inadequate for the transaction of the public business if it is to be occupied by persons who have no right to be here.

During the last three or four years I have heard, continuously, an appeal for the admission of the Commissioner of Agriculture on this floor. It has been a perpetual din and uproar, and we have been told that agriculture lay bleeding in the street because the Commissioner was excluded from the floor of the Senate. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the admission of the Commissioner to the floor if it is necessary. The Committee on Rules agreed to it unanimously. But there is just exactly as much reason why the Commissioner of Pensions should come in on this floor, why the Commissioner of Patents should come in on the floor, and why a half-dozen other officers of the Government should come in on the floor as the Commissioner of Agriculture; and I want it distinctly understood that the Committee on Rules, in asking that the rules should be enforced against this officer, had no intention whatever either of stigmatizing him or of affronting the great interest he represents.

I suppose the Commissioner apprehends that if he is placed after the judges of the Court of Claims he will not be able to obtain admission to the Chamber until all those who stand before him on the list have got in; but it ought to be distinctly understood that this matter of arrangement does not exclude the Commissioner until all the others have been admitted, that no matter where he may appear on the list of those entitled to the floor, whenever he appears at the door here properly accredited he will be entitled to come in on the floor, and if any Senator desires to see him he can see him whether the ex-Senators and governors and the General of the Army and the ministers of the United States are here or not. If it will be more satisfactory to the Commissioner of Agriculture to have his name placed at the head of this list, I shall vote with great pleasure to have it put there because it is the only way, I am convinced, to have an end of this perpetual solicitation that the rules shall be so enlarged as to permit the Commisioner of Agriculture to come in on the floor.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that there will be no objection whatever to the assignment that is asked by my colleague, and that the Commissioner of Agriculture will be placed wherever it will be most agreeable to him.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, so far as the statement of my colleague relates to anything that has been said on this floor about the Commissioner of Agriculture by any person representing the Commissioner himself, he has simply brought that in by his imagination, because it has no foundation whatever. It is all well enough for persons to speak on this matter with the contumely which has characterized the speech of my colleague, and to speak with that sneering tone and manner which has been applied to all the efforts that have been made to enable the class of people who are sneeringly called agriculturists to have some benefit from the legislation of Congress.

For myself I can say that this matter never was spoken of between the Commissioner and myself except on one occasion, when I happened to ask him to come here, and he found he could not get into the Senate, and waited for two hours, until 2 o'clock arrived, before he could even send in his card and I be advised of his presence. I wanted to consult him about matters of legislation then pending and still pending before this body. If he is so supersensitive as has been stated I have certainly never been advised of it. The Commissioner of Agriculture is not upon a footing with the Commissioner of Pensions at all. He reports directly to the President, which the Commissioner of Pensions does not. The Commissioner of Pensions is the head of a bureau in the Interior Department and reports to his superior, who in his turn can come here and speak to Senators privately or to members of committees with reference to all matters concerning his Department which may be pending in Congress. In that way the Commissioner of Pensions is recognized on this floor and has a representative here, while the Commissioner of Agriculture has not.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this amendment goes on the theory that the order of arrangement in the Senate rule depends upon the degree of honor or dignity of the persons named. Now, it is very manifest that this order depends wholly upon the order in which the officers named happened to occur to the scribe who wrote the first rule on the subject; probably that in part is explanatory of the present order, and then as other officers or persons were added from time to time to the list the persons admitted to the floor have appeared in the order in which the amendment to the rule admitting them was established. After "the officers of the Senate" come "members of the House of Representatives, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Clerk of the House." Then comes "the President of the United States." Does the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] suppose that it was intended to indicate that in the opinion of the Senate the office of President of the United States was lower in dignity than the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives or the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives? Then come "the heads of Departments." Then come "ministers of the United States," who are by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas to be placed below "the Commissioner of Agriculture," an amendment which is based on the idea that the Commissioner of Agriculture is to be put in in the order of a certain dignity which is supposed to belong to him or his office. Then come "ex-Presidents and ex-Vice-Presidents of the United States."

The theory on which the Senator proceeds is that the dignity of this officer, whoever may hold the place hereafter, is greater than that of General Grant or whoever else may have been called to the chief magistracy of the Republic and may have laid down the office.

The one person in this whole list whose presence in the list is a pure and distinctive mark of public honor, owing his place there to no official rank, comes almost at the close of the list, far below the place where the Senator from Kansas proposes to put the honorable Commissioner of Agriculture; that is Mr. Bancroft. His name was put in this rule as a tribute to an illustrious historian, scholar, and man of letters, who is perhaps the only living authority who can award a place of honor to the heroes and statesmen of our Revolutionary period and whose judgment of the character or career of any one of them would cause mankind to revise and reconsider its own if it differed from the accepted judgment. Does anybody suppose that when the Committee on Rules revised this rule they meant to place Mr. Bancroft at the foot of the list in a place of less honor than that of the Clerk of the House or executive officers or ex-members of the Senate who are named above him?

I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because while certainly nobody will suppose I desire any disrespect to the office of Commissioner of Agriculture or to the gentleman who fills it, the amendment is put on the ground that he is to be put in a certain place in this list because his office is of more dignity than that of the other persons who are named later in the rule.

Mr. PLUMB. The answer to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said is perfect. If there was no intention of making a distinction, why did not the committee accept the proposition which was made without any allegation of this kind at all? The committee on the other hand when they came to consider that proposition reported to put the Commissioner of Agriculture in a different place. There may have been some reason for that, but no reason has yet been offered. I propose to put him immediately after "the heads of Departments" and say "including the Commissioner of Agriculture." He is the head of a Department. He is entitled to go there; he is entitled, as I believe, under any possible construction of the words of the rule of which the English language can be capable, to be admitted without any amendment of the rule. I believe it was a violation of any proper construction of the rule to have excluded him, especially after he had been admitted here for six or eight years.

The Senator from Maine says the rule prohibited everybody. That is not correct. The Commissioner of Agriculture has always heretofore come in in his own right. The people who went into the cloak-rooms never went in in their own right, except a few lobbyists who had come to be practically incorporated in the constitution by reason of having had claims pending here thirty or forty years, and of course they came in in their own right; but outside of the persons named in the rule, and of those particular lobbyists—not a great number of them—nobody did come in in his own right. The Commissioner of Agriculture did, however. Therefore his coming into this Chamber is not to be compared to the intrusion of those private persons who went into the lobby.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that the Commissioner of Agriculture already has access to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. No.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand he has now under the rules access to the floor of the Senate. ["No!" "No!"] Then I misunderstood the language of the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, this morning. The Commissioner of Agriculture has access at present to the floor of the Senate. Am I right? I ask the Senator from Maine.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator is not correct. The Commissioner of Agriculture is expressly excluded by an order of somebody, and is not permitted to come on the floor of the Chamber any more than any private citizen.

Mr. SAULSBURY. For my part I think the rule might be enlarged so as to admit him; but I understood that was the case. I supposed it was simply a social question like that as to who should be "the first lady of the land," which is sometimes agitated. I saw, therefore, no propriety in the resolution of the Senator from Kansas. I have no objection to the Commissioner of Agriculture coming on the floor, and a great many other gentlemen I think might very properly be admitted. Complaint is made because of persons visiting the floor, but I have never had occasion to make complaint. A great many gentlemen come here from different parts of the country who desire to see the Senate and to form the acquaintance of Senators. They have heard of this body, and perhaps for the first time in their lives come here and want to look at it; but we exclude them from the floor of the Senate. I think any Senator might be trusted to invite a friend on the floor of the Senate. I think our rules are too stringent on the subject. If the Commissioner of Agriculture desires to come on the floor or any Senator desires him to come, I have no objection; but I think the rule ought to be enlarged. I would suggest a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules, that he may be assigned to the proper place on the list.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator misunderstands. The Committee on Rules has reported a resolution admitting the Commissioner of Agriculture. The Senator from Kansas is only sensitive because he was not placed up with the heads of Departments. That is all.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then it is a simple question of who shall be "the first lady of the land."

Mr. FRYE. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move to amend the rule by inserting after "the Architect of the Capitol extension" "the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. INGALLS. I move the reference of that to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that this amendment be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that motion will not be adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to its consideration to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order. The motion to refer, the Chair thinks, if agreed to would carry the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. The resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution to which the Senator from Vermont offers his amendment. The general question before the Senate is on agreeing to a resolution reported by the Committee on Rules, which has been amended on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], but the resolution is still before the Senate. The Senator from Vermont moves to still further amend the resolution, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] moves that this amendment be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no desire to carry the resolution to the Committee on Rules, but I submit to the Senator from Vermont that there is absolutely no reason whatever urged for this proposed extension. The Senator says it might possibly be convenient for this gentleman to appear on the floor and that he should like himself to see him here for a moment or two this morning if it were possible. If this exclusion is significant or valuable, if it is the intention to admit those here only who are necessary for the transaction of the business of the body, then the Senator from Vermont has given no sound reason why the rule should be extended. There certainly is not the reason for the admission of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution that there is for the admission of the Commissioner of Pensions, who has to do with business that is called to the personal attention of every member of this body probably a great many times every day.

I suggest that the Senator from Vermont had better ask for the consideration of a general resolution as to what further admissions to the floor shall be permitted, instead of asking that this one gentleman shall be admitted by an amendment to this pending resolution.

Mr. CONGER. The Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution is at the head of an institution known throughout the civilized world. The National Museum is connected with it. He represents perhaps, as far as this Government has any such representation at all, the literary and scientific progress of the people of the United States. He is at the head of an institution fostered by this Government, intimately connected with the question of the enlightenment of the people, the diffusion of knowledge among men; and I think myself that it would be an honor to the Senate and an honor to the country that we should recognize it from time to time as we summon the Secretary of that institution to a place here. The former Secretary, Professor Henry, reflected much credit on the literary and scientific attainments of the people of the United States. The present Secretary is a worthy successor. In view of the aid the Government has given to the institution I think it would be an honor to the Senate and an honor to the Government that its head should be recognized as worthy of a place to meet Senators in their own Chamber. I wonder that the proposition has not been made before this time. I shall very gladly support it now.

Mr. MORRILL. I am somewhat surprised that a single Senator should object to the admission of a gentleman of so great merit and whose extreme modesty we all so much appreciate. It has been common for us to apply to the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution for various kinds of scientific investigations, on ventilation and various other subjects that I might mention.

In relation to the necessity of the Commissioner of Pensions coming here, it is impossible for that officer to answer the inquiries of Senators or Members in relation to any private bill that may be pending; it depends upon facts in his office, and therefore we seek such information through letters directed to him at his office. It is not often that he will ever be wanted here for anything else.

I do not desire to consume time, Mr. President. If there are half a dozen Senators here who are against this proposition, I shall be disposed to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to refer the amendment to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to refer is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] did not offer a substitute, but only amended this resolution so that the portion of the resolution relative to the word "extension" remains.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments do not touch that part of the resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2728) detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern district of East Tennessee and attaching it to the middle district of said State, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3056) to constitute a bureau of navigation in the Treasury Department;

A bill (H. R. 6535) to regulate the granting of pensions in certain cases; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 235) to print additional copies of certain publications.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It is very desirable that some matters relating to our foreign affairs should have the attention of the Senate this morning at as early an hour as possible. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and six minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 17th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1871) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to offer a reward of $25,000 for rescuing or ascertaining the fate of the Greely expedition.

The message also announced that the President had on the 18th instant approved and signed the act (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be read by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1127) to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] will be quite willing to begin the consideration of that matter to-morrow morning; and as the morning hour to-day has been otherwise occupied, I ask consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under the eighth rule—the unobjected cases.

Mr. PLUMB. Several Senators have suggested to me that it would answer every convenience in reference to the consideration of the special order that its consideration should be postponed until 2 o'clock to-morrow. While I myself am perfectly ready and willing to go on with its consideration now, I think it may possibly be that that postponement may facilitate the consideration of the bill on account of some amendments which have been proposed and which may possibly be substantially agreed to without debate. If there can be unanimous consent that this bill shall remain the unfinished business for to-morrow at 2 o'clock, I shall have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts; but objection may come from other quarters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be informally laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills and resolutions on the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. COKE. Before that motion is put I wish to offer an amendment to the pleuro-pneumonia bill to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be received and printed and will lie on the table.

Mr. BECK. Before the request for unanimous consent is acted upon, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] whether a quite important bill that he presented and gave notice he would antagonize other bills with is likely to be called up, or if the pleuro-pneumonia bill can not be taken up, why that bill can not be proceeded with now?

Mr. FRYE. On consultation with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and at his very earnest request, I gave up the idea of contesting the position of bills with him.

Mr. BECK. But he does not seem to care to go on.

Mr. FRYE. I consented that he might go ahead undisturbed by any motion of mine, and I am very anxious that the Senator from Kansas should now proceed with the bill in his charge, so that at the earliest time possible the bill in my charge may come up for action.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not unwilling to go ahead; on the contrary I am quite willing to do so, but the suggestion was made that it would suit the convenience of some Senators and there was a possibility that a postponement till to-morrow might result in some composition of differences which would, perhaps, cause a diminution of debate upon this bill. At the same time I am perfectly willing to go ahead.

Mr. BECK. I only regret that the Senator from Kansas was not aware of his inability to proceed now before he antagonized other business quite as important. He might let his bill go off for four or five days just as well as till to-morrow morning.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Kentucky does not intend to do me an injustice. I am not showing any unwillingness to go ahead; on the contrary, I am willing to go ahead, and I am now only waiting on the suggestion of other persons, not my own. I am entirely willing to go ahead with this bill, and have been ready from the beginning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to granting the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], which is that the unfinished business be laid aside informally, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills and resolutions on the Calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. HOAR. If that arrangement is made now in relation to the Calendar, it can have, with reasonable patience on the part of the Senate, an hour and a half or two hours to-day. Then I ask that the agreement be that the Senator from Kansas shall take up the bill in his charge at the expiration of the morning business to-morrow, instead of at 2 o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. That is hardly just, because the morning hour to-day has been entirely consumed by other business.

Mr. FRYE. But the Calendar gets two hours now.

Mr. INGALLS. Very true; but that it is entitled to.

Mr. FRYE. It is only entitled to one hour.

Mr. INGALLS. It is entitled to the time from half-past 12 until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair reminds the Senate that this debate proceeds by unanimous consent.

Mr. INGALLS. Nobody is objecting to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No one has objected. The Chair has indulged it. It is the duty of the Chair to enforce the rule.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No one has objected to proceeding with the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to granting the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will call the first bill or resolution on the Calendar, under Rule VIII.

BRIDGE OVER CUMBERLAND RIVER.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill No. 304, Order of Business 460. It is a formal matter to which there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. INGALLS. Is that on the Calendar of cases reported and not hitherto called?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The bill will be read by its title for information.

The SECRETARY. "A bill (S. 304) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a free bridge by the mayor and city council of Nashville, Tenn., over the Cumberland River."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the city of Nashville, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Tennessee, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Cumberland River at the most accessible point within the corporate limits of the said city of Nashville, county of Davidson, and State of Tennessee. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the free passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers, and for such street-railways as may be authorized by the city of Nashville to be constructed over the same.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States: Provided, That the United States may construct a postal telegraph over said bridge without charge therefor.

SEC. 3. That if said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans the spans thereof shall not be less than one hundred and sixty-four feet in length in the clear, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river. The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least thirty-four feet above extreme high-water mark as understood at the point of location, and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river: Provided, That if the same shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the draw or pivot shall be over the main channel at an accessible point, and the spans shall not be less than one hundred and sixty feet in the clear, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with, and the bridge itself at right angles to, the current of the river, and the spans shall not be less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge: Provided also, That the said draw shall be opened promptly by said corporation upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats; and said corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of said city of Nashville; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the circuit court of the United States of the middle district of Tennessee in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers or to exempt this bridge from the operations of the same.

SEC. 4. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER. The title of the bill should be amended. There should be added to the title "and for other purposes," as there are some things involved in regard to the right of way for a postal telegraph.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that amendment of the title will be made. The title will stand as amended.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate now to consider a bill which was partly considered during the morning hour the last time the Calendar was under consideration, and is now unfinished in the morning hour. It is the first bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII, the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations. Its passage will dispense with the necessity of thirty or forty special bills and is a matter of great importance.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether the bill will lead to discussion?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I think not at all.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not press the consideration of that bill now. I am willing that it should stand at the head of the list, but there are some amendments to it in regard to the disposition of one or two of the reservations in my State, and the appropriation of the proceeds for other purposes, that I wish to present in connection with that bill. If the Senator will let it go over and stand at the head of bills under Rule VIII, to which I presume there will be no objection, I should be glad to have it so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the bill going over, holding its place?

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to accommodate every one and to have the bill in as perfect shape as possible, so as to dispense with special bills hereafter for the disposition of abandoned or useless military reservations. This matter has been pressed upon our attention for the last three or four terms of Congress by the War Department, and no action has been taken. I tried to see all Senators who had any amendments or suggestions to make, and conferred with them as fully as I could. I am sorry the Senator from Michigan did not advise me in advance that he had any suggestions to make. If, however, the Senator will have his suggestions ready so that we can dispose of the bill to-morrow morning in the morning hour, I am willing for it to lie over.

Mr. CONGER. I had introduced a bill in the Senate, which was referred to the committee of which the Senator is a member, in regard to the disposition of the proceeds of a part of the Mackinaw reservation, on Buffalo Island, and in my absence and without any intimation of the kind it was reported adversely and indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was reported adversely because we had reported a general bill. All special bills relating to that subject have been reported in the same way.

Mr. CONGER. I know it was, and it is for that reason that I wish to call the attention of the Senate to that subject-matter. The island of Mackinaw has been set apart as a military reservation and a national park. There is a military reservation which was reserved to Fort Mackinaw for the use of it on Buffalo Island, near by, which the Secretary of War will ask Congress to have sold under this provision perhaps, but its proceeds instead of going into the Treasury should be appropriated to the improvement of the Mackinaw fort grounds and the national park there. I wish that to be provided for in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am certain my good friend from Michigan will see that it would be very inappropriate to put a provision of that kind in a bill simply providing for the disposition of these reservations. If he wants a special bill of that kind, as a matter of course we shall consider it; but that is not really the disposition of an abandoned reservation.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know what the courtesy of this body requires, but I had introduced a bill which was three or four days before that committee, and without a word or opportunity to see anything about it it was reported adversely in my absence and indefinitely postponed. I will take the liberty of objecting to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, being objected to, goes over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I give notice that to-morrow morning I shall move to take it up and consider it.

Mr. CONGER subsequently said: I ask permission to withdraw the objection I made to the consideration of the first bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection being withdrawn, the bill holds its place under Rule VIII on the Calendar.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I feel a very deep interest in Order of Business 391, being the bill (S. 531) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, who is the widow of Rear-Admiral McDougal, now in old age and almost entirely deprived of sight. The bill has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Pensions of this body, and yesterday a similar bill came over from the House, having passed the House. If the Senate will indulge me in taking the bill up, I will move to substitute the House bill, so that when it passes the Senate it will be a law and give her the benefit of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Indiana that he learns from the Chief Clerk that the House bill referred to by the Senator is pending before the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES. I can move its substitution and the Senate can adopt it. I have it here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate had charge of the bill the Senate could certainly act upon it, if it chose to do so.

Mr. VOORHEES. I suppose the Senate can act upon any bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator submit any motion?

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to take up Senate bill No. 531.

Mr. BLAIR. I suggest to the Senator that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question about the right of the Senator to make such a motion.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am very much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for that kind suggestion. I move to take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 531) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal.

Mr. INGALLS. It was the understanding that we should proceed with the consideration of the cases on the Calendar under Rule VIII. This method of calling up cases is unjust to those who lack the vigilance necessary to obtain the attention of the Chair. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill asked for by the Senator from Indiana, which is meritorious, but I give notice that in justice to all who desire the consideration of bills I shall hereafter object to those that are not called in their regular order on the Calendar.

Mr. VOORHEES. In the main the Senator from Kansas is right, but this is an exception.

Mr. INGALLS. I say I do not object to this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I have a bill earlier on the Calendar very much than the one to which my colleague has called the attention of the Senate, of precisely the same character and in precisely the same situation, the Senate bill having been reported favorably, and since then a bill of the same kind having been passed by the House. I suggest to him whether we should not reach all these matters by moving to proceed now or at some early day to all the pension cases on the Calendar, passing over other business, as we have repeatedly done.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not do that now?

Mr. VOORHEES. I was just waiting until my colleague got through to make that proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Indiana on the right of the Chair allow the Chair to suggest to him——

Mr. VOORHEES. With great pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That if his motion to take up the Senate bill on the Calendar with a view of substituting the House bill for it is carried, and if that is done, it becomes a Senate bill and must go back to the House for concurrence or other action on the part of the House. If the Senator desires to reach the House bill he had better move to discharge the committee and ask the Senate to consider the House bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall do that.

Mr. MORRILL. Do it now.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand that Senate bill 531 is now before the Senate. I intend, if the Senate will bear with me for a moment, to move to discharge the Committee on Pensions from the further consideration of House bill No. 79.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is not yet before the Senate. Is there objection to proceeding to the consideration of the bill? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will state to my colleague that I have been trying for several days, and I have been conferring with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Pensions, as he will bear me witness, to get a favorable opportunity, and I know no more favorable opportunity than now, to call the whole Pension Calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit to my colleague that he should make that motion now, and then he will reach his case presently in order, and we shall get through with them all very easily.

Mr. VOORHEES. If I have not proceeded too far in the special case to make the general motion, I move, if the Senator from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. MITCHELL], will allow me that liberty and concur with me in it, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Pension Calendar and dispose of all cases upon it.

Mr. HARRISON. Bills reported favorably.

Mr. VOORHEES. Bills reported favorably and which are not objected to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of pension bills upon the Calendar reported favorably? The Chair hears no objection. The first pension bill favorably reported now upon the Calendar will be laid before the Senate.

FRANCIS SCOTT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 626) to increase the pension of Francis Scott and to rate him in the second grade of pensioners.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear the report in that case, or some reason for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK February 19, 1884:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 626) granting an increase of pension to Francis Scott, late a private in Company B, Twenty-third Regiment Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, examined the same and report:

That the soldier is now pensioned at $24 per month, being the rate by existing laws, being the amount allowed for loss of arm below the elbow. But the facts show, while the arm is off below the elbow, yet above the elbow of the left arm has been an excision of about four inches of the bone, so that he has no use of the arm.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill so amended as to give him the same pension as a soldier now receives, or which shall be allowed hereafter by law to one who has lost one arm at or above the elbow; also further amended so that the increase shall take effect from the passage of this act; also by striking out of title, and in bill, the words, "and to rate him in the second grade of pensioners."

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, after the word "shall," in line 5, to strike out "be rated in the second grade of pensioners; and that;" in line 7, after the word "the," to strike out "4th day of December, A. D. 1883, the said Francis Scott shall" and insert "passage of this act;" and in line 10, after the word "received," to insert "or which shall be allowed hereafter by law to one;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That Francis Scott, late a private in Company B, Twenty-third Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, now on the pension-roll at the rate of $24 per month, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to receive the same pension as a soldier now receives or which shall be allowed hereafter by law to one who has lost one arm at or above the elbow or one leg at or above the knee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of Francis Scott."

CATHARINE BULLARD.

The bill (S. 1173) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard was announced as the next pension bill on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to discharge the Committee on Pensions from the consideration of House bill 406, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill in lieu of this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the House bill mentioned by him.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I now ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 406, which is identical with the Senate bill which has just been read.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Catharine Bullard, widow of Dr. Talbot Bullard, deceased, an acting volunteer surgeon, at the same rate as the widows of surgeons of volunteers are now paid.

Mr. HARRISON. The same amendment was made in the House that the Committee on Pensions of the Senate recommend, so that it reads now exactly as the Senate committee amended the Senate bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRISON. I think now the Senate bill had as well be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, Senate bill 1173 will be indefinitely postponed. The Chairs hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

MARTIN KELLY.

The bill (S. 909) to increase the pension of Martin Kelly, and to rate him in the second grade of pensioners, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "month," to strike out "shall be rated in the second grade of pensioners; and that;" in line 7, after the word "the," to strike out "4th day of December, A. D. 1883, the said Martin Kelly" and insert "passage of this act;" and in line 10, after the word "receives," to insert "or which shall be allowed hereafter by law to one;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That Martin Kelly, late a private in Company A of the Sixteenth Regiment United States Infantry (now of the District of Columbia), now on the pension-roll at the rate of $24 per month, from and after the passage of this act shall be entitled to receive the same pension as a soldier now receives, or which shall be allowed hereafter by law to one, who has lost one arm at or above the elbow or one leg at or above the knee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to increase the pension of Martin Kelly."

ELIZABETH A. BARBOUR.

The bill (S. 689) granting a pension to Eliza Barbour was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments; after the word "of," in line 4, to strike out "Eliza" and insert "Elizabeth A.;" and after the word "provision," in line 7, to strike out "of the law relating to pensions" and insert "and limitations of the pension laws;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of Elizabeth A. Barbour, widow of James E. Barbour, late hospital steward of the Twenty-first Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers, upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Barbour."

THOMAS PATTON.

The bill (S. 828) granting a pension to Thomas Patton was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment; after the word "roll," in line 9, to insert:

At the rate of $4 per month until the passage of this act, and to continue hereafter at such rate as may be required by the ordinary examinations.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Patton, late a private in Company B, One hundred and forty-second Regiment New York Volunteers, said pension to commence from the date when his name was dropped from the roll, at the rate of $4 per month until the passage of this act, and to continue hereafter at such rate as may be required by the ordinary examinations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAURA C. P. HASKINS.

The bill (S. 429) granting a pension to Laura C. P. Haskins was announced as next in order.

Mr. SLATER. A House bill for the same person has been sent to the Committee on Pensions, and I was instructed to report it back. I think it is the same as the Senate bill with the amendment reported. I ask that it may be passed over for the reason that there is some discrepancy as to the name, as to which there was supposed to be an error. I will call it up at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there consent that the bill be passed over at the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears no objection, and it is passed over.

MARY J. VAUGHAN.

The bill (S. 732) for the relief of Mary J. Vaughan was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, after the word "of," in line 8, to strike out "his death; deducting all payments heretofore made upon her present pension certificate" and insert "the passage of this act;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Mary J. Vaughan, the widow of George Vaughan, late second lieutenant of Company K, of the One hundred and eighteenth Regiment of New York Volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate allowed a lieutenant's widow, to commence from the date of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WESLEY MORFORD.

The bill (S. 280) granting a pension to Wesley Morford was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Wesley Morford, late a private in Company K, Twelfth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the bill just passed ought to be amended so as to read "from and after the passage of this act." It seems to be in all the other bills and is not in the last one. "Subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension law, from and after the passage of this act," should be the language.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no objection to it, but it is unnecessary under the general law, which provides that in all cases pensions shall begin from the time of the passage of the special act.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no objection to putting it in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done now only by reconsidering several votes or by unanimous consent.

Mr. COCKRELL. By unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to incorporating in the bill just passed the language stated by the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and the bill is so amended.

CAROLINE M. M'DOUGAL.

The bill (S. 531) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal was announced as next in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. The House of Representatives has passed and sent to the Senate the identical bill which the Senate committee has reported and which is now reached upon the Calendar. I wish to substitute that bill for the Senate bill, and move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to considering the House bill referred to by the Senator from Indiana, in lieu of the Senate bill just read? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to inquire whether on the record that bill is not now in the possession of the Committee on Pensions? If it is, the committee should be discharged before it can be considered by the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. My motion embraced the discharge of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the first question. The Chair omitted to put that question. Will the Senate discharge the Committee on Pensions from the further consideration of the House bill referred to by the Senator from Indiana?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I now move the indefinite postponement of Senate bill No. 531.

The motion was agreed to.

WILSON W. BROWN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 337) granting pensions to Wilson W. Brown and others was announced as the next pension bill in order on the Calendar.

Mr. JACKSON. I ask that that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks that the bill be passed over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ERASTUS W. BABSON.

The bill (S. 772) granting a pension to Erastus W. Babson was announced as the next pension bill in order.

Mr. BLAIR. That bill must necessarily be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next pension bill in order on the Calendar will be announced.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to say in regard to the bill just passed over, it having been favorably reported and there being apparently no objection to it, that since the report of the bill the pensioner has died in consequence of his disabilities contracted in the service, and I desired that it be passed over in order that we may obtain the name of the widow. He leaves a widow and dependent children, and it will be necessary to amend the bill by substituting the name of the widow for that of the deceased as soon as we can ascertain it.

MARY E. MURRAY.

The bill (H. R. 1433) granting a pension to Mary E. Murray was announced as the next pension bill on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill has been under consideration before, and I object to it. It will consume a great deal of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

LAURA C. P. HASKINS.

Mr. SLATER. I ask to return to the bill (S. 429) granting a pension to Laura C. P. Haskins, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a report from the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving the report? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SLATER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laura C. P. Haskins, to report it favorably, without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Laura C. P. Haskins, widow of H. D. Haskins, as a lieutenant in the One hundred and tenth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the bill (S. 429) granting a pension to Laura C. P. Haskins be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

KATHARINA T. WUNSH.

The bill (S. 316) granting a pension to Mrs. Katharina T. Wunsh was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "month," to strike out the words "to commence from the 15th day of May, A. D. 1880, the date of the death of said Frank Wunsh, and to continue during her widowhood" and to insert "from and after the passage of this act;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Mrs. Katharina T. Wunsh, widow of Frank Wunsh, late a private in Company D, One hundred and twenty-sixth Regiment (Eleventh Cavalry) Indiana Volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJOR D. WILLIAMS.

The bill (S. 394) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Major D. Williams was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to restore to the pension-roll the name of Major D. Williams, late captain of Company C, Twelfth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, at $20 per month, from the 13th of September, 1869.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear the report in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK March 24, 1884:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 394) to restore Major D. Williams, having examined the same, respectfully report:

That this bill was fully examined by committee of last session, and passed the Senate. The following report, then adopted, contains all the facts:

"Capt. Major D. Williams was mustered into the service on the 12th of September, 1863, in the Twelfth Regiment of Indiana Cavalry, and served as a brave, faithful soldier until September 19, 1864. At the battle of Huntsville, by the rearing or plunging of his horse, he was severely injured, the pummel of his saddle striking his abdomen, making a wound in the skin from which the intestines protruded.

"He continued on duty a few days, but was soon compelled to go to hospital, where shortly after he was discharged for the above cause for total disability. His participation in the fight and injury was attested by the colonel and surgeon of the regiment and other witnesses. He was placed on pension-roll at $20 per month.

"Afterward a letter was sent to the Department stating that Captain Williams had hernia before entering the Army. This letter referred to witnesses to prove assertion. A special examiner was sent to examine the case. The person writing the letter knew nothing, and his witnesses were equally ignorant. What suspicions they had were founded upon hearsay. The examiner continued the investigation with no better success, having exhausted Indiana and Michigan in his effort. Captain Williams, early in life, had hernia in left side, which when he entered the service had substantially passed away, leaving nothing but a slight puff. This did not prevent his doing duty until injury at the battle of Huntsville, and had not the remotest connection with the injury which disabled him permanently, and for which pension was issued.

"This case is so distinctly and clearly proven that we recommend the restoration of said Major D. Williams to the pension-roll from the date of his suspension, and further recommend the accompanying bill as a substitute for bill S. 1530."

The committee recommend the adoption of Senate bill 394 with an amendment.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to add the words "the date his name was dropped from the roll."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALONZO B. CHATFIELD.

The bill (S. 1299) to increase the pension of Alonzo B. Chatfield was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to add "such increase to date from the passage of this act;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension of Alonzo B. Chatfield, late of Company B, Thirty-third Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, be rerated and included as equal disability with that class of pensioners who have lost an arm at or above the elbow, under an act of Congress entitled "An act to amend the pension laws by increasing the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or leg in the service, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883, such increase to date from the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN ALGOE.

The bill (S. 783) to increase the pension of John Algoe was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the pension of John Algoe, formerly of Company A, Tenth Regiment Michigan Infantry State Volunteers, to $50 per month.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the committee why they have not put in the word "captain" after "formerly," so as to show his rank?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not remember exactly what the bill states on that subject. I have no objection to the rank being stated, if it is not in the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. It simply reads "formerly of Company A." It would seem to be giving it to a private soldier, and there are distinctions made on account of rank. I move to insert the word "captain;" so as to read:

Formerly captain of Company A, Tenth Regiment Michigan Infantry State Volunteers.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that being inserted.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not rise to object to the amendment, but this increase is made not by reason of rank, but by reason of increased disability, as I understand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M'CLURE.

The bill (S. 1910) granting a pension to William McClure was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the bill by filling the blank in line 5 with the words "Company A, Third Illinois Light Artillery;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William McClure, late a private in Company A, Third Illinois Light Artillery, and to pay him a pension from the date of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE PRINCE.

The bill (S. 1680) granting a pension to George Prince was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of George Prince, late a sergeant of Company I, Third New Jersey Cavalry Volunteers, at $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he now receives.

Mr. JACKSON. I should like to hear the report read in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR March 25, 1884:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1680) granting a pension to George Prince, having examined the same, make the following report:

The claimant, George Prince, late sergeant Company I, Third New Jersey Cavalry, was pensioned March 22, 1866, for gunshot wound of face, at $6 per month from August 30, 1865. This was increased to $20 per month from June 6, 1866, and further increased to $24 per month from June 4, 1872. Under the act of March 3, 1883, his pension was again increased to $30 per month.

The physician who has been attending him for some years past has presented the following affidavit:

MARCH 21, 1884.

I have known Mr. George Prince for many years, and am familiar with the terrible wound he received during the late rebellion. The wound is an open one, constantly discharging an offensive secretion. During the past year his health has rapidly deteriorated, and he has become totally incapacitated for manual labor of any character. Even were he physically able, the offensive discharge from the wound and the hideous appearance of same would effectually debar him from private business or employment.

L. M. TAYLOR, M. D.

The applicant appeared before the committee in person, exhibited his wounds, and described his condition in answer to questions by the members of the committee. The statements made by the surgeon in the above affidavit were fully corroborated by the examination of the committee. It is one of those cases of hideous and indescribable disfigurement, combined with actual and increasing disability, exiling the sufferer from society, and rendering him at the same time, to a great extent, incapable of manual labor. He has hitherto been employed to some extent as a watchman, but his capacity to perform labor of that or any other description appears to be passing away, and in the opinion of the committee the time is not remote when he will be practically helpless. Mr. Prince also stated to the committee that he had an invalid wife and four children dependent upon him for support. The children are still young, he having married rather late in life.

The committee believe the increase to $50 called for by the bill should be granted, and recommend its passage.

Mr. JACKSON. There is no minority report presented in that case, though the committee were not unanimous in making the report. The applicant came before the committee, and stated to the committee that he was receiving $60 a month now as salary, which is a good deal above the average wages paid in the country to laboring men, and for one I doubted the propriety of increasing the pension to $50. He has a disagreeable wound about the face and has lost one eye, but he has had three increases of pension, and I doubted the policy or propriety of increasing it to $50.

Mr. BLAIR. The report has been read. I do not know that it attracted the attention of the Senate. This soldier is now drawing a pension at the rate of $30 per month, and the bill proposes to increase the pension to $50. He is a man with a wife and four children. The children are young and unable to contribute toward their own support. The wife is a sickly woman. The pensioner himself has hitherto been able to perform more or less labor as a watchman. I do not understand that he has been capable of any sort of labor that called for severe manual exertion. The principal wound that he appears to be suffering from is in the face, and was inflicted in such a way as to destroy one eye and seriously, I believe, to affect the other, so that such sight as he has is gradually and pretty rapidly failing. The wound is open, discharging constantly, and although aside from the wound when in health he must have been a fine specimen of physical manhood, yet he is now in that pitiable plight that his presence in the committee-room was a source of extreme offense to any healthy individual who was present. The man is not only disabled, but he is incessantly haunted with a consciousness that he must be an exceedingly offensive object to the best friends he has in the world.

It seemed to the majority of the committee that this was one of those cases where actual disability called for the amount of increase that was desired; and the other circumstances were such that for one I felt no capacity whatever to deny the increase called for by the bill. I know that was the sentiment of a majority of the committee, and I did not recall, until the Senator from Tennessee expressed his disagreement to the report, the fact that there was anything but a unanimous report here.

I have stated all that I care to state in regard to the case. The soldier lives in this city. Such employment as he has is that of a watchman, and that is quite precarious. The probability is that he will not be able to endure the amount of physical exertion that that requires for a great length of time, and there can not be many situations that he could fill as a watchman, for the reason that it is not often that the man would be so situated that his presence would be acceptable.

Mr. GROOME. As a matter of course, and to make the bill consistent in that regard with others that we have passed to-day, I move to amend it by inserting in line 8, after the word "month," the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A BANK.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to now consider Order of Business 470, being a bill to change the name of a national bank.

Mr. GROOME. I should like to ask whether we have finished the consideration of pension bills favorably reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that they have been concluded.

Mr. GROOME. Then I make no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1850) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask permission of the Senate to call up Senate bill 1559, being Order of Business 248. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1559) to define the title and duties of certain officers of the Medical Department of the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 3 of section 1 I move to strike out "six," before "colonels," and insert "officers of the rank."

Mr. COCKRELL. How many of them are there?

Mr. LOGAN. Six.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why not say "the six officers," so as to have no misunderstanding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois modify his amendment according to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified is, in line 3 of section 1, after the word "six," to insert "officers of the rank of," and to change the word "colonels" to "colonel."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 6 of section 1 I move to strike out, after "surgeons-general," the word "with," and insert "continuing to have;" so as to read:

That from and after the passage of this act the six officers of the rank of colonel now authorized by law, designated as chief medical purveyor, surgeons with the rank of colonels, and assistant surgeon-general, shall be styled assistant surgeons-general, continuing to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonels, to be placed on the Army Register in the order of seniority of dates of present commissions as colonels.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 1 of section 2, after the second word, "the," I move to insert "officers of the rank of," and in line 4, after "surgeons-general," to strike out the word "with" and insert "continuing to have;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That the officers of the rank of lieutenant-colonels now authorized by law, designated as surgeons with the rank of lieutenant-colonels, and as assistant medical purveyors, shall be styled deputy surgeons-general, continuing to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonels, to be placed on the Army Register in the order of seniority of dates of present commissions as lieutenant-colonels.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. In line 11 of section 2 I move to strike out all after the word "detailed."

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 11, section 2, after the word "detailed," it is proposed to strike out "upon the recommendation of the Surgeon-General, from the grade of deputy surgeon-general or of surgeon;" so as to read:

That the deputy surgeons-general shall be assigned to such duties in the Medical Department as the interests of the service may demand. That the duties of assistant medical purveyors shall be performed by officers detailed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. These amendments are for the purpose of making the bill clear.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish very much to give more consideration to this bill than I can now. With these changes that are made I scarcely understand it. I know that it gives a great advantage to one particular officer.

Mr. LOGAN. Which bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. This bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; it gives no advantage at all; and these changes are only to make the bill read as it ought to read. They do not affect the bill a particle except to change the language to make it perfectly clear.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not sure that I like the purpose of the bill itself. I will object now to its further consideration, but the next time it is called up I will not object. I desire to consider it and to get the opinion of the Medical Department itself about this bill, and especially about the changes made in it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed as it has been amended.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not think it is necessary to go to the additional expense of reprinting it.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I have no objection to the opinion of the Medical Department being taken, but I must say that I can not understand what the Senator means by this changing any relation of officers in the Medical Department. The only change it makes at all is to make this department conform to other departments in reference to the name and not the rank. The rank of a solitary officer in that department is not affected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut withdraw his objection?

Mr. HAWLEY. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the question is not debatable and the bill goes over.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to its going over, of course. The Senator understood the bill when it was reported; at least I thought so.

AGREEMENTS WITH SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 408, being the bill (S. 1004) to accept and ratify certain agreements made with the Sioux Indians, and to grant a right of way to the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company through the Sioux reservation, in Dakota.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not feel disposed to make any objection, but I wish to state at this time that for about a month I have been waiting here to see some regular proceeding with the Calendar, and I find that that is not among the possibilities of the session. Inasmuch as the bill that I feel most interested in would be reached at any time the Calendar should be proceeded with during the morning hour, it being commonly called the Potomac free-bridge bill, I shall ask the Senate to take it up during the morning hour next Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON]? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. Before the bill is read I desire to give a notice. I desire to say that after the disposition of the two special orders, to wit, the pleuro-pneumonia bill and the shipping bill, I shall move to take up the bill known as the Utah bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1004) to accept and ratify certain agreements made with the Sioux Indians, and to grant a right of way to the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company through the Sioux reservation, in Dakota.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, line 546, after the word "than," to insert "one hundred and eighty-eight;" and in line 555, after the word "said," to insert "one hundred and eighty-eight;" so as to make the clause read:

That said tribes of Sioux Indians do hereby grant said railway company, its successors and assigns, the right to hold and occupy not less than one hundred and eighty-eight acres of land at the western terminus of said railway, on the eastern bank of the Missouri River, at or near the mouth of American Creek, in said Territory, for freight and passenger depots, warehouses, machine-shops, and founderies, steamboat and ferry landings, and for all other railway purposes, for the residence of its employés, and for no other purposes, and to be occupied under such regulations as the honorable Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for the protection of the Indians, said one hundred and eighty-eight acres of land to be definitely located by said railway company as soon as the necessary surveys have been made to determine the point at which the road of said company shall strike the Missouri River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, as section 4, the following:

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect only from and after the date of a proclamation issued by the President of the United States that satisfactory evidence has been presented to him that the several agreements herein ratified have received the assent of the Sioux Indians in conformity with the requirements of existing treaties with said Indians; and such evidence shall be presented to the President within one year from the passage of this act.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This proposed right of way is through that portion of the great Sioux reservation which, under the bill passed by the Senate a few days ago, will be thrown open to settlement; consequently the line will not run through the Indian reservation at all, and therefore there is no necessity for this section 4. I therefore, on behalf of the Committee on Indian Affairs, ask leave to withdraw the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DAWES in the chair). If there be no objection the amendment will be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In lines 360 and 361 of section 1 the date of filing is not given, and I propose this amendment: to strike out "on the — day of" and insert "filed with the honorable Secretary of the Interior in the year 1880." There was but one filing, so that that is a sufficient designation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In lines 92 and 93 of section 1 I move to strike out "on the — day of" and insert "in the year;" so as to read:

Filed by said railroad company with the honorable the Secretary of the Interior in the year 1880.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is probably too late to interpose; but I see certain things in the articles of agreement made with these Indians which I think ought to have been different. I suppose to attempt any change in them now would be to send this back again for further negotiations. I do not know that the objections are serious enough, but I think that a thousand acres of land is rather a large allowance to make out of this Indian territory for machine-shops and founderies at one of the termini of the road. And here is another clause that I ask attention to. I do not propose to move any amendment, but I call attention to it:

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There is a supplemental agreement by which the railroad company agrees, if the Indians desire it, to reduce that amount from a thousand acres to six hundred and forty.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then there is on the sixth page this paragraph:

It is further covenanted and agreed that the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company, its successors and assigns, shall have the right to occupy and hold along the line of said railway, exclusively for railway purposes, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres of land at any one point.

The points may be contiguous for aught I know along the whole line. There is no limitation as to the number of places at which the selection of one hundred and sixty acres may be made.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. They are to be selected with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HAWLEY. For stations?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. For stations.

Mr. HAWLEY. It were better to have said so. I have no doubt the motive is good, and I shall make no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The next bill is a similar bill, to ratify and confirm the agreement made by the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company with the Sioux Indians, and I should like to have that taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the consideration of Senate bill 1496. Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that motion will not be made until this bill goes through. It is like the other, though not nearly so long.

Mr. CALL. It will take a long time to read it.

Mr. CULLOM. Oh, no.

Mr. CALL. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read, there being no objection to its consideration.

Mr. HAWLEY. Before the Secretary begins I desire to say that I wish to withdraw my objection to the bill as to the Surgeon-General's Office, but this bill will probably prevent its further consideration this evening. I withdraw the objection now so that the Senator from Illinois may call it up when he pleases.

Mr. LOGAN. I will call it up in the morning.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1496) to accept and ratify certain agreements made with the Sioux Indians, and to grant a right of way to the Dakota Central Railway Company throughout the Sioux reservation, in Dakota.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to insert as section 4 the following:

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect only from and after the date of a proclamation issued by the President of the United States that satisfactory evidence has been presented to him that the several agreements herein ratified have received the assent of the Sioux Indians in conformity with the requirements of existing treaties with said Indians; and such evidence shall be presented to the President within one year from the passage of this act.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. For the reasons stated by me when the former bill was under consideration I withdraw the proposed amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the committee withdrawing its amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In section 1, line 198, I move to strike out "on the — day of ———, 188–." There is no necessity for that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the motion the Chair will first lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 1127) to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuropneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 22, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. PHILLIPS BROOKS, of Boston.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday; when,*

On motion of Mr. LORE, the reading of so much of the Journal as related to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions was dispensed with.

The residue of the Journal was read and approved.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF A PAIR.

Mr. CHACE. I rise to a question of personal privilege. I find that in the RECORD of the 20th instant I am reported as neither voting nor paired. On the 12th instant I was paired with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NICHOLLS], the pair to continue until further notice. In pursuance of that agreement I refrained from voting on the bill providing for the establishment of a bureau of labor statistics. Had the gentleman from Georgia been present I should certainly have voted for that bill. I think it must have been through mistake that my pair was not announced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the statement of the gentleman's pair is now on file at the desk. Perhaps by some oversight it was not announced.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the House Calendar for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. 5043) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to invest the lawful money deposited in the Treasury, in trust, by national banking associations for the retirement of their circulating notes.

The bill, as amended by the Committee on Banking and Currency, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized, out of any lawful money deposited by national banks for the purpose of retiring their circulation, under the provisions of section 4 of the act of July 20, 1874, and of sections 5222 and 5230 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and of section 6 of the act of July 12, 1882, to purchase at current market rates, under such regulations as he may prescribe, such bonds of the United States as in his judgment will be for the interest of the Government, the bonds so purchased, together with the interest that may accrue on the same, to be held in trust and used for the payment of the circulating notes of the banks which have deposited lawful money for such payment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think this is a matter of too much importance to be acted upon hastily, and I shall have to object.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for one moment until I can explain to the House the importance of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to reserve the objection till the gentleman has made his explanation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, probably no more important measure than this relating to the currency of the country and to the prevention of its contraction can possibly be presented. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and unanimously approved by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WELLER. I can suggest a better way of meeting the difficulty.

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment. Gentleman are aware that under existing laws national banks, when withdrawing their bonds and going into liquidation, are obliged to deposit in the Treasury lawful money, which lawful money thus deposited contracts the circulation of the country to the extent of the deposit.

Mr. WELLER. Let the national banking system be wiped out. I enter my objection to the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. The amount of money now deposited in the Treasury of the United States by the banks is $40,000,000, contracting the currency to that extent, and the amount is being increased at the rate of $2,000,000 a month. I hope neither the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] nor the other gentleman will object, because the bill is so simple in its provisions; what it proposes to do can be so clearly seen and is so necessary to prevent contraction of the currency.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If one objection is not enough, I object.

Mr. DINGLEY. One point, Mr. Speaker. Will not the gentlemen who object consent——

Mr. WELLER. There is not anything the gentleman can say that will remove my objection.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Very well; I have done my duty.

CHINESE TREATY STIPULATIONS.

Mr. BUDD. I offer, and ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration of, a resolution setting apart a day certain—Saturday, the 3d of May—for the consideration of House bill No. 1798, to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, a bill generally demanded by the Pacific coast and unanimously agreed upon by the delegations from that section of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers a resolution for immediate consideration. The resolution will be read, and the Chair will then ask if there be objection.

Mr. MONEY. Let us hear it first.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, May 3, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe it is confined to a single day.

The SPEAKER. It is confined to a single day.

Mr. MILLS. And not to interfere with revenue bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORRISON. Unless the gentleman from California changes the day from next Tuesday to Saturday of next week I shall have to object.

Mr. BUDD. It does so read at present—Saturday, the 3d of May. That is my motion. I amended or changed the resolution as originally drawn so as to read Saturday, the 3d of May.

The SPEAKER. The date is right, or in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from California; but the day named is "Tuesday."

Mr. SUMNER, of California. That is a clerical error.

Mr. BUDD. That is a mere clerical error. I intended to draw my pen through the name of the day on the line, when, at the request of Mr. MORRISON, I inserted Saturday above it, and changed the figure date.

Mr. MORRISON. With the day fixed at Saturday, the 3d of May, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears no objection. All those in favor of the resolution will vote ay——

Mr. HITT. I object.

Mr. SUMNER, of California. I hope not. This is a proposition to set apart a day for the consideration of a bill that is called for and approved by nearly every citizen on the Pacific coast irrespective of party. It is not a party measure. Besides, I think the objection comes too late and I make that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the objection comes too late.

Several MEMBERS. Too late!

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard no objection in time in response to the question if there be objection. It now comes too late.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BUDD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6752) amendatory of an act to incorporate the Columbia Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

KANSAS CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that to-morrow I will ask the House to consider the contested-election case of Wood vs. Peters, of Kansas.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to amend his notice so that it will be after the disposal of the pension appropriation bill, which will come up to-day after three speeches on the tariff. But it may lap over until to-morrow. I do not know that it will lap over, but I wish to provide against every contingency.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I will endeavor to accommodate the gentleman from Pennsylvania if I can.

MARY SULLIVAN.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6753) granting a pension to Mary Sullivan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EAST TENNESSEE JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask by unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2728) detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern district of East Tennessee, and attaching it to the middle district of said State, and to put it on its passage, with an amendment suggested by my colleague [Mr. MCMILLIN]. It has been unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter the county of Grundy, in the State of Tennessee, shall be detached from the southern district of East Tennessee and be attached to the middle district of Tennessee, and that all process hereafter issuing against citizens of said county of Grundy from the district or circuit courts of said State shall be returnable before the district or circuit courts for the middle district of Tennessee; and that any case now pending in the district or circuit court of the United States for the southern district of East Tennessee against citizens of said county of Grundy may, at their election, be transferred to the district or circuit court for the middle district of Tennessee, at Nashville.

Mr. DIBRELL. Now read the amendment of my colleague [Mr. MCMILLIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the county of Fentress, in the middle district of Tennessee, be detached therefrom and be added to the southern district of East Tennesse, and hereafter all process issuing against citizens of the county of Fentress from the district and circuit courts of the United States shall be returnable before said court at Chattanooga, in said State: Provided, That causes now pending in the middle district of Tennessee from Fentress County shall be determined when pending, except in causes where both parties consent to removal.

There was no objection, and the bill was brought before the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN'S amendment was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBRELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEVENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. CALKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6754) authorizing the President to appoint an additional circuit judge in the seventh judicial district; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY SANDHAVEL.

Mr. CALKINS, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 6755) granting a pension to Henry Sandhavel, first lieutenant Company H, Twenty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY A. OLCOTT.

Mr. EATON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved, That there be paid to Henry A. Olcott the sum of $623 for services as assistant in the library of the House of Representatives, being the difference between the pay of messenger and that of assistant, from July 1, 1876, to December 10, 1881.

LEASE OF POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I ask, by unanimous consent, to take up for action at this time the bill (S. 1508) to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes. To meet the objection of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have agreed to reduce the limit in the bill from ten to four years. I desire to say further there are now cases pending in the Post-Office Department where the Postmaster-General declines to make a lease, because he can not do so advantageously to the Government. This is a plain business proposition and will save money to the Government. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a report accompanying this?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it had better be examined more carefully.

Mr. KASSON. It has already been examined by a House committee.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. And reported unanimously by the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. RANDALL. If there is a report, let us have it read.

The SPEAKER. There is no report accompanying the Senate bill, but the Chair is informed that there is a report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads on a similar bill in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we ought to have more time to consider this matter.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the motion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I call the attention of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] to the statement I now propose to make. It is personal in its character. In the debate of last evening with reference to the bill introduced by myself from the Committee on the Census, providing for the publication of the Compendium of the Census and other documents, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] is reported to have said during the discussion of that question:

I stated to my friend from New York, when he came to my desk, that I should not make any objection or raise the point of order on the proposition to print 25,000 copies of the Compendium of the Census if that was all that his proposition contemplated, and that the committee would make no objection to that. But since this proposed measure contemplates the printing of a great many other matters, which the committee have also under consideration, I must make the point of order against it.

Afterward the gentleman went on to say:

If my friend from New York will confine himself to what I understood him to state was the object of his bill I will withdraw the point of order; but so long as he insists on the passage of this bill, containing a great deal more than I had any idea of from what the gentleman stated to me, I must insist on it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, from the language which I have quoted, used by the gentleman from North Carolina, it would appear that I had deceived him into the belief that my bill only contemplated the publication of the Compendium of the Census; and, furthermore, that upon the statement made by me that as it only contained provision for the publication of that document, he agreed not to make the point of order. I stated at the time, in response to that, that I tendered him all the papers in reference to the bill, including a statement as to the monographs, to examine.

I will state now again, in answer to what has been said by the gentleman from North Carolina, that I handed to him a paper to read which contemplated the publication of the monographs also, and I will further state in the presence of the gentleman from North Carolina that I told him orally that I did contemplate in my bill the printing of the monographs provided for. I showed him another paper or memorandum, which contained my calculations, namely: for the publication of the compendium, $31,960; and for the monographs, $25,500; making a total for both publications of $57,460.

I made that statement to the gentleman from North Carolina in presence of the gentleman from Illinois I think [Mr. DUNHAM], to whom I will now yield.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, in support of what has been said by the gentleman from New York I wish to say that I was present at the interview that occurred on yesterday between the gentleman fron New York and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] while the latter gentleman was at his seat in the Hall. The question was asked by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] of the gentleman from New York how much money was involved in the matter of this publication. The gentleman from New York showed him the figures, which he had on a piece of paper, aggregating some $57,000. He showed him also the figures in detail for the 25,000 copies of the Compendium of the Census and the monographs. The gentleman from New York did state to the gentleman from North Carolina plainly that this proposition contemplated not only the printing of the Compendium of the Census but also the printing of these monographs, at the same time holding up a piece of paper and showing him the figures, amounting to $57,000 in all, that is to say, 25,000 copies of the compendium to cost about $31,000, and the monographs to make up the balance of the $57,000——

Mr. COX, of New York. Thirty-one thousand dollars for the Compendium.

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes; $25,000 for the monographs and about $31,000 for the compendium, making a total of $57,000, covering the whole expense. It was my understanding also that the gentleman from North Carolina, on the statement made to him by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], would make no objection to the proposition. I make this statement because I think it is due to the gentleman from New York that the House should have a correct account of the matter.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have seldom risen to a question of privilege in my long service in this House. Perhaps as a rule such questions do not amount to much. But I could not to-day take that chair to look this House in the face with anything in the nature of a stigma upon my good name. I require that good name to stand me in stead for any emergency, for emergencies come to us all here at times.

In addition to what I have already said I state that I showed my friend from North Carolina a statement which I had prepared and proposed to use in connection with the discussion of the subject. I do not know, as I said yesterday, whether he read it or not. I pointed out to him also the correspondence I had had with the Census Office, but I do not know whether he examined the document I left with him closely or not at all. I think the Speaker will bear me out also in the statement, that when the gentleman from North Carolina approached him with reference to this subject he mentioned the fact that the amount covered by the bill which I proposed to introduce was $57,000, covering the compendium and monograph.

Now, my relations with the gentleman from North Carolina are to me almost sacred from old associations. From the confusion, or perhaps the little jealousy about this business, or whatever it may have been, he may have forgotten for the moment my statement as to these monographs. I regard them as part of the Census Reports. He perhaps thought they might have been included in the compendium. If so, it only shows the necessity of having a full debate on these subjects before money is expended.

When the gentleman from North Carolina brings in his bill authorizing 25,000 copies of the compendium it will go to the Committee of the Whole. It contains appropriations. I advise the House now that I will then offer an amendment to print both the compendium and the monographs, at a cost amountingto some $57,000. And I trust that will be satisfactory to the old members as well as to the new members, in whose interest especially this matter was brought forward in the Committee on the Census. I ask leave to publish the statements which I hold in my hand. The one marked A was in the possession of my friend from North Carolina. The other statements are from the Commissioner of the Census and the Public Printer. They will serve to facilitate the discussion when it comes up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York having printed in the RECORD the statements to which he refers?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCALES. I am much surprised, and I may say pained, at the course pursued by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]. I was wholly unprepared for an issue of this sort, whether sustained by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] or whether unsustained by anybody but the gentleman from New York. There was no occasion for an issue of veracity. I made no charge of that sort against the gentleman from New York. I simply stated to him what my understanding was; and the gentleman knows as well as I do, in my opinion, what my understanding was, and that is the reason why he did not make this issue with me yesterday. He knows that I stated to him that if he meant to publish the 25,000 copies of the compendium, my committee had acted on that part of it and would not object to that, and that for this reason I would consent to that and would not make the point of order on it. It is true the gentleman said something to me about these monographs, and spoke of the cost of his bill, amounting to about $57,000. But I did not agree to this, and after repeated conversations I believe that he only meant to press the printing of the Compendium of the Census.

So far as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] is concerned I desire to say this, and I think the gentleman from New York will sustain me in it, that when he came to me I protested against his doing what he proposed. I told him it was wrong and did not meet my approbation. But at his urgent personal solicitation, and because of our old associations, to which he has alluded and which I had cherished as much as he, I consented not to make the point of order as to the compendium. And I may say here that because of those associations I have been somewhat surprised to find him making an issue of this sort between him and myself, when any difference should have been put down to an honest misunderstanding and settled by ourselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I went to you to know whether the point of order would be sustained. I said to you what the proposition would cost, but that I was disinclined to make the point of order because my committee had agreed to print the compendium, and if Mr. COX did that it could not be amended; whereas if we reported it it could. After I saw you I then went to the gentleman from New York, and I think it was not until the third interview, some time after we had the talk in the presence of the gentleman from Illinois, that the matter was finally agreed upon as to what should be done. I had told him only I thought I should do so, but I had not finally determined and he knew I had not determined, because he came to my seat after I saw you, half an hour or more after the interview in the presence of the gentleman from Illinois, and urged me not to make the point of order.

I believe the gentleman from Illinois means to state what is right, but when he says I consented to it he is totally mistaken. For while he was there I protested against it, but before the gentleman from New York left I admitted again that I would consider it and might upon such consideration agree to it; but, as I said, sir, in the outset, it was my understanding that the proposition was in accord with the action of my commmittee upon the 25,000 copies of the compendium, and this fact I stated fully to the gentleman from New York and gave him the same reason for withdrawing my opposition that I had assigned to the Speaker.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like also, if the House pleases, to publish some extracts from some foreign journals as to the utility of these publications, showing the wonderful value attributed to them by some of the worst critics against our country in Austria, Scotland, England, &c. I desire to have them appear in the RECORD preparatory to the debate that may come up on this proposition for printing.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the extracts referred to by the gentleman from New York will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. The bill I was authorized by the Select Committee on the Tenth Census to move for the passage of under a suspension of the rules provides for the printing, binding in cloth, and distribution of an edition of 25,000 copies of the Compendium of the Tenth Census. This edition will consist of copies of two volumes each. Sixteen thousand copies are for the use of the House, to be supplied to members at the House folding-room. Eight thousand copies are for the use of the Senate, to be supplied to Senators at the folding-room of the Senate. One thousand copies are for the use of the Department of the Interior. The cost of this edition of the compendium will be about $31,960.

There is a general and I may say a very pressing demand by members of this House and Senators for the compendium. The same may be said respecting certain reports contained in the large quarto volumes of the Census Reports.

The printing in monograph form and distribution of a number of these special reports which are mostly in demand are also provided for in this bill.

The object in printing these monographs is to meet, in the most economical manner, the repeated calls on members of Congress, as well as the Census Office, for copies of special reports which in their present form of publication are bound with the large quarto volumes of the Reports of the Tenth Census.

So far this demand has been mostly for thirty-two of the special reports.

In the paper marked A, which I now offer, is a statement showing the nature of these reports, the number of each provided for in the bill, and an estimate of the cost of their publication.

The total number of the proposed edition of Census Report monographs is 84,500. The estimated cost, as given by the Census Office, of printing this edition and binding it in paper, with illustrations, is about $25,000. This estimate is I think somewhat too low. The cost will probably be a little more.

I am satisfied that the publication of these monographs will be the most economical mode of diffusing the special information for which there is such great demand, and which could now be furnished only by a large and expensive edition of the quarto volumes of the Census Reports. The demand for this information is too great to be supplied by the distribution of the quarto volumes. The expense would be enormous.

I submit herewith, as part of my remarks, a letter addressed to me on the matter covered by this bill by the acting Superintendent of the Census Office, under date of March 19, ultimo, marked C. The bill provides, in respect to the distribution of these monographs, that one-half of the edition shall be for the use of the House and one-fourth for the use of the Senate, to be supplied to Senators and Members in the same manner as that prescribed for the edition of the compendium. The remaining one-fourth of the monograph edition is to be given to the Census Office for distribution. The following extract from a letter addressed to me by the acting Superintendent of the Census, dated March 31, ultimo, will explain the reason for supplying the Census Office with this number of monographs:

> In the preparation of these monographs many facilities were afforded this office and the authors of the reports by persons throughout the country who claimed no compensation therefor, but to whom assurances were given (or authorized) by the Superintendent of Census that they should receive copies of the particular reports in the preparation of which they have gratuitously assisted. But for such courtesy, which it is now desired to officially recognize, much greater expense would have been incurred in connection with the preparation of many of these reports; and the assurances which the former Superintendent felt justified in extending it is the earnest desire of the present Superintendent to fulfill. And it may be added that a distribution of copies to such persons would be placing the reports in the hands of those who would be most appreciative of their value.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1884.

SIR: Under date of January 19, the Superintendent of Census submitted to the Secretary of the Interior an estimate of the sum required for this office during the remainder of the current fiscal year in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated for that purpose. This has been transmitted to Congress in the general estimates of deficiencies for the present fiscal year by the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury.

As the early action of Congress upon this estimate must be asked, I venture to address to you, as chairman of the House Census Committee, a statement of the general requirements of this office and the present status of its work.

First, as to the status of work: In addition to the Compendium of the Tenth Census, consisting of two octavo volumes of 923 pages and 846 pages, respectively, there have been printed and published, as forming so much of the final report, four quarto volumes, as follows:

	Pages.
1. Statistics of population	961
2. Statistics of manufactures	1,198
3. Statistics of agriculture	1,149
4. Agencies of transportation	869

Volumes V and VI, quartos of 924 pages and 848 pages, respectively, now all stereotyped and being rapidly printed, comprise the final report on cotton culture in the United States, containing monograph reports on this industry for each of the cotton-producing States.

Volume VII will comprise the report on wealth, debt, and taxation, the entire matter for which is ready for the printer and the greater part already in type.

Volume VIII will comprise the report on forestry and the lumbering industry of the country, a magnificent monograph of 1000 quarto pages, with numerous illustrations. This matter is complete, and only awaits the facilities for publication.

The succeeding volumes, the exact order of publication and of construction of which has not been definitely settled, will comprise the following reports (pages partly estimated):

	Pages.
Statistics of mortality	1,200
Social statistics of cities	1,500
Report on the production of petroleum	315
Report on quarries and building stones	400
Report on newspapers and the publishing interests	475
Report on Alaska, its resources, &c	190
Report on the fur seals of Alaska	176
Report on ship-building	200
Mining laws of the United States	687
Statistics and technology of the precious metals	800
Social statistics of mining districts	200
Statistics of the base metals and of mining east of one hundredth meridian	800
Statistics of fire and marine insurance	900
Statistics of life insurance	100
Water-power of New England Water-power of North Atlantic Water-power of Middle Atlantic Water-power of South Atlantic Water-power of Northwest Water-power of Missouri River Water-power of Mississippi River	1,000
Water Supply of cities	300
Report on shop tools	150
Report on pumps and pumping-engines Report on engines and boilers	75
Report on wool and silk machinery	50
Report on fruits and orchards Report on hop-culture Report on sheep-husbandry and wool-growing	450
Report on southern fruits	25
Report on the gas industry	50
Statistics of ice	25
Statistics of wages	500
Statistics of fisheries	600
Statistics of oyster industry	250
Statistics relating to schools, libraries, and churches	500
Statistics of the defective, dependent, and delinquent classes	1,000

Of these reports all have been completed with the exception of the report on the statistics of mortality, and of the last two, relating, respectively, to schools, churches, and libraries, and to the defective, delinquent, and dependent classes. On these there remains to be done so much work only as may require the continuous services of the present force thereon engaged for the remainder of the present fiscal year.

Many of the reports above described will be more or less profusely illustrated. Contracts for these illustrations have been made by the Public Printer, and are in various stages of advancement. In addition, there are in type or stereotyped 5,893 pages, composing parts of several of these reports.

From the statement thus briefly made it may be seen that most of the work remaining to be done in this office has relation to the publication of reports which are otherwise completed. Revision, preparation of copy for the printer, proof-reading, and correction constitute in large part our present employment.

Second, as to the requirements of the office:

In order to continue such work of revision and arrangement, which is essential to the orderly and rapid progress of publication, and to complete the unfinished work relating to the statistics of schools, libraries, and churches, and to the deaf, blind, idiotic, and insane population of the country, and the mortality statistics, it is important that the present clerical force should remain practically intact throughout the remainder of the current fiscal year, and for this purpose an appropriation of $25,000 as a deficiency has been asked of Congress. In addition thereto the Superintendent has submitted an estimate that the sum of $5,000 per month will be required from July 1, 1884, for so long as may be necessary to bring to publication the remaining volumes of the final report of the Tenth Census. The duration of such period it is difficult to estimate at this time. But it will be largely, in fact almost wholly, dependent upon the facilities of the Government Printing Office with relation both to printing and binding, and to the completion of its contracts for the various illustrations.

As these estimates of additional appropriations required for the work of the Tenth Census will naturally and properly be subjected to severe scrutiny and discussion, and may provoke a comparison of cost of the tenth with previous censuses, I venture to submit for your consideration a few figures showing in comparison the cost of the Ninth and of the Tenth Censuses, with a brief statement of the scope of each.

The Ninth Census cost, in round numbers, exclusive of engraving and printing, $3,334,000, a per capita cost, based upon the total population in 1870, of 8 cents 6 mills. There has been appropriated for the expenses of the Tenth Census, exclusive of engraving and printing, $4,775,000, a per capita cost to date, based upon the total population in 1880, of 9 cents 5 mills.

If the scope of inquiry at the two censuses had been just the same, then upon the basis of the above expenditures the results of the Tenth Census would have cost per capita 9 mills more than did the Ninth Census. But the scope of the Tenth Census was vastly larger by reason of two factors—

First. The inquiries relating to such subjects as were common to both censuses (notably the inquiries relating to the population and to agricultural industries), which were almost double those at any previous census, were much more numerous at the Tenth Census, and were framed with a view to secure more exhaustive and detailed information than was had at the Ninth Census. The cost of the Tenth Census was therefore increased not merely in proportion to the increase of population and of the industries inquired of, but by a more detailed and elaborated plan of enumeration and subsequent treatment.

Second. In addition to this, the scope of the Tenth Census included fields of inquiry untouched at any preceding census, and in truth unknown to any other single statistical work. But although heretofore without precedent in combination or in the history of censuses, the new subjects of inquiry were of such general interest as to justify their inclusion in the scheme of the most elaborate statistical work ever undertaken.

But leaving out of view the more extensive and exhaustive treatment of the old subjects, and simply considering the gross sum expended on investigations common to both censuses, it will be found that the relative cost per capita at the Ninth Census was greater than at the Tenth Census. Thus, if from the total cost of the latter be deducted the sum of expense attending new investigations which were untouched at the Ninth Census, it is shown that the sum of $4,080,480 has been expended at the Tenth Census as against $3,334,000 at the Ninth Census, or a per capita cost of 8 cents 1 mill at the Tenth against a per capita cost of 8 cents 6 mills at the Ninth Census. The Compendium of the Ninth Census was an octavo volume of 942 pages, and the final report in extenso was comprised in three quarto volumes of (1) 853, (2) 702, and (3) 848 pages, respectively, making a total of 2,403 quarto pages. The average cost per page of this report was $1,390.

The Compendium of the Tenth Census consists of two octavo volumes of 923 and 846 pages, respectively. The final report in quarto form will contain not less than 18,000 pages, at which estimate the average cost per page, based on amount of appropriations already made, would be $265. (These figures are in each case exclusive of the cost of illustrations and printing.)

By another method of comparison it might be shown that the increase of population in the decade from 1870 to 1880 was 30 per cent. A proportionate increase in the cost of the Tenth Census would have called for an expenditure of $4,334,000, and this proportionate increase, in view of the more elaborate treatment of the old subjects, would not have been excessive. So that the entire cost of collecting and compiling all data relating to new subjects of inquiry may be said to have cost $441,000 in excess of what might fairly have been estimated as the cost of the Tenth Census if the scope and treatment of the latter were to be uniform with that of the Ninth Census. And for this comparatively small sum the Government will have produced the noble results comprised in the reports on forestry, cotton culture, social statistics of cities, the cereals, resources of Alaska, and many other valuable and unique monographs contained in the final report of the Tenth Census.

In order that the few compilations remaining unfinished may be completed within this fiscal year, and to prevent such a reduction of force as would result in a practical suspension of the work of publication now so rapidly progressing, it will be necessary to have the additional appropriation asked for made available before the 15th of March next.

This fact has been communicated to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, and I have the honor to ask your consideration of this letter in connection with any action which may be taken relative to an immediate appropriation. Very respectfully,

GEO. W. RICHARDS,
Acting Superintendent of Census.

Hon. S. S. COX, Chairman Committee on Census,
House of Representatives.

EXHIBIT C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1884.

SIR: If there should be favorable action taken by the Congress with reference to printing additional copies of the Compendium of the Tenth Census it would be advisable to embody in such an edition numerous changes, consisting in part of typographical errors discovered subsequent to the issue of the original edition, together with some errors both of omission and commission in the clerical work of preparing the tables of the compendium for publication. These changes, though of more or less consequence, are not vital, and would not justify any great additional expense, but they can be readily made at trifling cost if a subsequent edition of this work should be issued.

I venture to call your attention to the matter, although I presume that an order to print additional copies of this book would be sufficient authority for the incorporation of previous omissions and for the rectification of other errors without direct legislative action.

I beg also to address you and submit, for the consideration of your honorable committee, the suggestion that separate editions of each of certain of the monographs embodied in the general report of the Tenth Census be printed, in issues of numerical size commensurate with the probable demand for each. In this way, as it seems to this office, the most economical response may be made to the popular call for different portions of the final report.

Thus notably should be published such monographs as "The Cereals," by Professor Brewer; "Ship-building," by Henry Hall; "Alaska," by Petroff; "Foresty," by Sargent; the several reports on cotton culture in the various cotton-producing States; and other monographs having both a general and special local interest.

For example, the report of Professor Swank on the manufacture of iron and steel may be presented. This monograph as at present published forms part of the general quarto volume numbered II, which is devoted to the statistics of manufactures.

An edition of 20,000 copies of this volume has been authorised, and this number may possibly be deemed sufficient to supply the demand of the country at large for the general statistics of such industries; but in addition thereto is a lively local cry for Swank from such localities as are mainly and especially interested in the manufacture of iron and steel.

To respond to this special call with the report published in present form would necessitate a further large edition of the entire volume on manufactures. The same difficulty has obtained with relation to other monographs, and applies with equal force to all the more valuable and interesting special reports. If separate editions of each of these more important monographs, ranging numerically from 3,000 to 10,000 copies, proportioned to the particular demand, each copy to be plainly bound in cloth, were authorized by the Congress, I believe that such action would in the most economical manner meet a reasonable demand, which is daily increasing, for particular portions of the final report.

Within a few days I shall have the honor to submit to your honorable committee, through yourself, a list of the monographs which the present demand would seem to indicate might most profitably be thus issued, with the numerical size of the edition of each, which in the judgment of this office is desirable, together with the estimated cost thereof.

Very respectfully,

GEO. W. RICHARDS,
Acting Superintendent.

Hon. S. S. COX, M. C.,

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

It is needless to tell our readers that the Tenth Census of the United States,* of which the first completed volume now lies before us, was the most perfect, the largest in scale, the most minute and accurate in detail, the fullest of varied information that the world has yet seen. It is equally needless for those who have any experience, direct or indirect, of American State papers to say that its records promise to be fully worthy of the work. Every detail is given in its proper place; the economical history of every State, county, and township may be traced in elaborate statistical tables; the general results are collected, worked out, and formulated with utter indifference alike to labor and cost, with profound consideration for the ignorance, laziness, and convenience of the reader. The investigator bent on pursuing some special statistical inquiry will find materials not merely provided, but arranged, catalogued, summed up to his hand. The student who, without any such special interest, seeks merely a general view of American progress during the last century will find in the first pages of the volume before us all that he can desire in a threefold form—in text, tables, and maps, all equally excellent in their way. The maps display in the most impressive and striking form the movement of population. In the first three decennia this had not been very considerable. The population was increasing steadily and constantly, as a population with no restraint on multiplication, economic or natural, is sure to increase.

The natural rate, as gathered from the widest available survey, is supposed by statisticians to be something over that expressed in the saying that population doubles in twenty-five years. And it is a significant fact that economists with no bias on the subject, certainly with no bias in favor of slavery, found in the multiplication of the slave population of the Southern States the best and most typical illustration—the case of a people breeding at a rate restrained by no prudential considerations, where economic conditions were all in favor of rapid multiplication, without that carelessness of infant life which characterizes nearly all barbarian races and counterbalances their natural rapidity of breeding. The negroes naturally multiplied as fast as they could. Their masters took care that babies worth $20 in their first year, and rising in pecuniary value with every twelvemonth, should neither be neglected, starved, nor maltreated. Apart from emigration it is probable that no people has ever multiplied so rapidly as did the negroes south of Mason's and Dixon's line from 1810 to 1860. Immigration there was; for, as the deficiency of a free colored population shows, great part of the slaves of the so-called free States were not emancipated, but exported southward; but their number was not sufficient to affect seriously the population of those States in which agricultural labor was, necessarily or not, almost confined to the negro race. But the maps before us exhibit the general, not the special, movement of population.

* Statistics of the Population of the United States at the Tenth Census. June 1, 1880. Francis A. Walker, late Superintendent; Charles W. Seaton, Superintendent. Washington: Government Printing Office. 1883.

In 1790 this was confined to a strip along the Atlantic coast from the south of Maine to the north of Georgia. The territory west of the Mississippi still belonged to France, the coast of the Gulf to Spain. Long after the acquisition of Louisiana—that is, of the whole western side of the Mississippi Valley—the greater part of that valley still remained almost unpeopled. In 1820 there was a little strip of fairly peopled country, with between twenty to forty-five souls to the square mile, along the eastern bank of the Mississippi, as far north as the Yazoo; and population had begun slowly to spread northwestward in the vast territory surrendered by Virginia to the Union, with the sole condition that slavery should never be allowed therein; the territory whose surrender cost Virginia so dearly, which furnished the best part of the armies that devastated her soil and crushed out her independence. Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, and a comparatively narrow belt including about one-half of Alabama, were thinly peopled, counting from two to twenty souls to the square mile. From this date the westward progress of settlement has been constant and constantly increasing. The preponderance of political power, of agricultural and mining resources, if not of commercial and manufacturing wealth, now lies west of the Alleghanies; and the real "star of empire," the dot which on American statistical maps represents the so-called center of population is in each tenth year placed a little farther from the inner slope of those mountain ranges which a hundred years ago were to all intent and purpose the extreme western frontier of American civilization.

In 1850 that point fell, somewhat singularly, in Western Virginia, one of the most thinly-peopled districts east of the Missouri. In 1880 it seems to have been almost identical with the position of Cincinnati, in the well-peopled State of Ohio. In thirty years it had moved some four degrees of longitude to the westward, still along the thirty-ninth parallel of latitude. The slowness, rather than the rapidity, of its movement will surprise those most who have most closely followed the rapid filling up of the great prairie States and the almost more rapid peopling of the western bank of the Mississippi. The greater part of the North-East, from Lake Michigan to the Atlantic, has a population of between forty-five and ninety, the greater part of the South, east of the Mississippi, one of twenty to forty-five souls to the square mile. In no considerable region, those surrounding the great cities excepted, does the population exceed the highest of these figures. But more than half the domain of the United States—Alaska of course left out of account—is still unpeopled. With the exception of a few strips in California, Oregon, Colorado, and Utah, where the population scarcely ever reaches twenty, and is generally under six, the whole region west of the one hundredth parallel had in 1880 fewer than two souls to the square mile. Great part of this region is, of course, all but uninhabitable. The great alkali desert will not, till the conditions of human life and industry have undergone some gigantic revolution, be peopled in any sense. The vast plateau drained by the Colorado and its tributaries is doomed to barrenness by the enormous depth of its water ways. But it would take four times the present population of the Union, as evenly spread as railroads and steamers can distribute them, to bring up the entire country to the standard of Iowa, Missouri, and Illinois, much more to that of Ohio, Indiana, New York, and Pennsylvania.

THE GRAND WORK OF THE AMERICAN CENSUS.

Among the many things about which we ought to learn from our transatlantic brethren is the manner in which they take their census.

The censuses of the countries of Europe are not to be compared in the least with the magnificent and exhaustive enumerations which the United States regularly pursues every ten years, beginning in 1790. Not alone the population, but also the relations of the population are subjects which the American census settles with an accuracy never reached and never even attempted by any European enumeration. Besides the actual enumeration of the population, the census of the United States contains the statistics of occupations, of wealth, debt, and the most accurate and particular data relating to all branches of manufacture and industry. The census also contains full information regarding the agricultural resources of the country, which serves as a basis to the continuous reports of the Agricultural Department, for it enumerates directly the number and size of farms, the value of agricultural implements, value and quantity of products, of live stock, and many other things, the knowledge of which in other countries has always been neglected, and certainly has never anywhere been inquired into to such an extent. The American census contains also the statistics of the various industries of the country, with retrospective comparisons to facilitate the proper judgment and consideration of its present magnitude. Hundreds of questions, which in the majority of the European states are slurred over, since there exists no source from which positive data can be obtained, are solved by the American census through diligent research. Any one attempting a comparison between the Austrian and American statistics of industry will soon be convinced of the utter impossibility of such an attempt.

The Government of the United States introduces its practical sense into this part also of its machinery. It seeks by statistical paths everything that bears upon any part of political economy. In Austria we often enough feel the necessity for better information, but we are not granted the means to procure it.

When during the last census the necessity of an enumeration of the industries of Austria was spoken of one encountered deaf ears only. It is even said that the few statistics that were gathered on this point can not now be printed on account of the necessary appropriation not having been granted.

The American census further includes the statistics of transportation, railroads, steamboats, canals, telephones, and telegraphs, and these complete the picture of industrial development, to the further comprehension of which such statistics as relate to insurance and public indebtedness are added. Finally, this splendid work contains in separate monographs a series of the most important articles relating to intellectual culture. We find statistics of schools, of newspapers, and various lights are thrown upon the intelligence, the illiteracy, and the mortality of the population.

The Government of the United States has published a compendium of nearly 1800 pages, which presents all the most important statistics in tabular form, which compendium was published in an edition of 25,000 copies.

But this was only to serve the purpose of giving to the public the gathered facts as quickly as possible. It was only the precursor of the imposing census work, the publication of which has been authorized by Congres.

The first six volumes are ready for the press. The first of these has just been placed in our hands, and excites not only just commendation and admiration as regards its form and press-work, but also a painful feeling of comparison with the truly trivial publication which the Austriaa Government has issued.

Aside from the tabular exhibition the American census offers abundant attractions even to those who are afraid of statistical tables. An explanatory text is added, and graphic charts and maps illustrate the volume in such numbers as were hardly ever added to any statistical work.

A rapid glance over the charts relating to the density of population, foreign and native, white and colored, temperature, rainfall, &c., is sufficient to explain the most involved statistics. These charts represent many laws of the growth of the entire country, relative to which other states have not even made the slightest attempt to obtain information. To give only one example: the advance of the center of population. We in Austria know, even now, not where the point of gravitation of the population, in the sense of the American census, exists; that point, namely, upon which the entire population bears with equal weight. We only feel that the advance of this political point of gravitation takes place from southwest to northeast, without being at all clear whether such movement is not exactly contrary to the one which the laws of demography indicate as the natural one.

EXHIBIT G.

[From the Scotsman.]

It is not easy to witness without a pang of envy the stately procession of volumes that issue from the Census Office of the Department of the Interior at Washington. Naturally one seeks to compare with them the fruits of the labors of our own census commissioners, and to find something that will gratify national self-satisfaction. In truth, however, a comparison is barely possible. Those to whom has been intrusted the task of collecting, systematizing, and tabulating the British statistics of population in 1881 have done the best they could, and it may further be acknowledged that they have done well. There have been some notable improvements in method, and a general advance in clearness and fullness. Altogether a laborious duty has been performed, with an amount of conscientious care and ability which are pleasant to contemplate so long as the American census reports can be kept out of view. These, however, are on another plane. The hard work, the painstaking, striving after accuracy and completeness, is here; but there is also an extraordinary amount of hard thinking in combination with a remarkable talent for bringing forth the illuminating and informative virtue of statistics. No cost, also, has been spared in bestowing on the figures all the fresh meaning and significance that can be derived from colored map, diagram, and illustration. A literary and scientific staff have been employed to write upon such subjects as the history and peculiar social conditions of the leading cities of the Union, the progress and present state of its great industries, and the outstanding facts in its geology and kindred studies.

These supplementary papers are valuable both as monographs and as sidelights on the main body of facts and figures. The dry bones of statistics have been clothed in flesh and blood, and emblazoned with artistic devices, and invested with almost romantic interest. Take the massive volume which has just issued from the Department of the Interior, containing the completed returns of the population at the Tenth Census of the United States. It contains more than seventy maps and diagrams, illustrating, among other things, the distribution and composition of the population as regards race and sex and birthplace; and the climatic conditions of the country as regards temperature, rainfall, and elevation. Most of these are full-page; many of them are beautifully tinted; all of them display extreme care. The great features and even the small details of the statistical tables are focused, and, as it were, photographed in these maps. Without assistance from the reports or returns, one may gather from them a singularly full and clear knowledge of the past and present stages of the development of the American nation. Here, for instance, are a series of maps that exhibit the density and spread of population from one decennial period to another. With what vast strides the course of empire has held its westward way; with what unfailing instinct the rushing tide of population has selected the choicest and most accessible lands and the strategic points for commerce and industry; with what a bound it has cleared the Rocky Mountains and overrun the rich gold and grain yielding region beyond, leaving the mountain plateaus and deserts for leisurely after-occupation.

We are not surprised, of course, to find that the incoming hosts, having the choice of half a continent before them, still refuse to invade the pine-colored heights of Maine, or the Everglades of Florida, though these lie close to the Atlantic; and that, except where a metalliferous bait is held out, they "fight shy" of the bad lands of the Missouri or the arid deserts of Arizona and Nevada. But observe the unerring instinct with which population adjusts itself to the best conditions of soil and climate. It abhors extremes, whether of high or of low elevation, of moisture or aridity, of heat or of cold. Not one-fifth of the inhabitants choose to live below the 100-foot survey line; only 3 per cent. will consent to ascend above 2,000 feet. No less than 98 per cent. have selected a mean annual temperature between forty and seventy degrees, though over vast tracts of country the mean rises above or falls below these limits; the relatively small region having a rainfall between thirty-five and fifty inches in the year possesses nearly 72 per cent. of the inhabitants. Or examine the charts which exhibit the laws under which the colored and the foreign-born population arrange themselves in varying degrees of density, in obedience to geographical position, climate, and prevailing occupations. These two elements of the curiously mingled American nation are the complements of each other. Where the one is heavily massed, the other takes open order or holds entirely aloof. Forebodings may arise that in this inveterate tendency of the immigrant races from Europe to appropriate to themselves the Northern and Northwestern States, and the tenacious hold which the people of African blood retain on the South, we see the direful spring of future woes unnumbered to the Union.

From other maps and diagrams we are enabled to discern that the peculiar idiosyncrasies of the different European races display themselves in choice of locality and occupation, and in other ways. The Irish are discovered clinging to the Eastern States, eschewing agricultural pursuits in favor of town occupations, and becoming "congested" in the poorer parts of the great cities, as they are in the wilds of Connemara. Turning to the tables, it is found that 45.26 of the population of Irish birth were in 1880 congregated in the fifty largest towns of the Union. The German emigrants also are largely dwellers in towns, 38.73 of the emigrants of that nationality being settled in the populous centers. Compare with this the percentages of natives of England and of Scotland—29.87 and 30.01, respectively—that have chosen urban in preference to rural localities; or as furnishing a more marked contrast, the proportions of Norwegians and of Swedes found in the large cities, which are only 8.02 in the case of the former, and 14.08 in the case of the latter.

Ireland and Germany still continue to furnish the largest quota of the European immigrants to the States, and to form the chief elements of the foreign-born population of the principal cities; the Irish being predominant in eleven and the Germans in twelve out of the twenty-three towns having more than 20,000 inhabitants. Yet, alike in the cities and in the country generally, their proportion to the aggregate foreign-born population and to the total population is falling off in the case of both, while the proportion of natives of England and Scotland is slowly, and that of natives of Scandinavia rapidly, growing. The French also have relatively fallen off, while the British-Americans, the Hungarians, the Poles, the Italians, the Russians, and the Chinese have relatively increased. This curious fact, too, has to be noted in regard to the Celtic and Teutonic strains which during the past half century have most largely contributed to the peopling of the United States, that for some occult reason they decline to fuse together. Thus it appears that while in the census year there were 1,611,000 persons of Irish birth and 1,276,000 persons born in Germany living in this country, and besides these, it is calculated, about four millions and a half of persons of Irish parentage and a somewhat larger number of German parentage, the number scheduled as the offspring of marriages between men and women of the two races is "astonishingly small."

The Irish in America, indeed, intermarry very little with the native-born or with any of the other elements of the population. The same is still more true of the Scandinavians; but this is due largely or wholly to the manner in which these settlers are grouped together in compact colonies in the Northwestern States, to the strangeness of the language, and to the newness of the immigration. On the other hand, study of the maps and tables reveals the Germans yielding readily to "considerations of personal adaptiveness, of affection, of pecuniary interest, or of propinquity in mating for life, in spite of differences of speech." In the case of the English and Scottish immigrants who have no "differences of speech" to surmount, they succumb even more readily to those considerations which produce a blending of the foreign and native born population. This is greatly assisted by the wide range over which these two classes of immigrants have spread themselves. The Scotch especially have a remarkable tendency to scatter, instead of aggregating together like the Irish; from the very early history of the States we read "the Scotch were, as they are now, everywhere, though not largely in New England, nor generally in colonies anywhere." Scottish blood is therefore widely though not very lavishly sprinkled throughout the whole Commonwealth, and the American stock and the American character we may venture to say are all the richer and stronger for that admixture. The Irish themselves become cosmopolitan in their affections and blend freely with the other elements of the population when—as in the South and the West—the force of circumstances compels them to give up their gregarious ways.

Volumes of information concerning the social organization and habits of the American nation are conveyed by means of shadings of the maps and lines in the diagrams and by the very classification adopted in the tabular statements of trades and occupations. Thus the age and the stage of development of the various States and Territories is indicated with wonderful accuracy in the diagrams, showing by means of circles the bulk and proportion of the male and female population in each. Where, as in the Eastern States, it is seen that the female element appropriates to itself a full half or more of the area of the circle, civilization is fully organized and firmly planted; where, as in Colorado or Montana, it fills little more than one-fourth part of the sphere, society is a chaotic and unlovely thing, the rude work of man laboring without a helpmate. So, also, in the tables of occupations; wherever the proportion of bread-winners to the population is abnormally high, there, we may conclude, the rough pioneering work of colonization is still going on. In new and remote States and Territories the introduction of the domesticities and amenities of life can be gauged in figures. In Wyoming, while the population increased 128 per cent. in the decennial period, the numbers engaged in occupations only increased 34 per cent.; in Arizona there was an increase of 319 per cent. in population, and only 269 per cent. in workers. This does not mean that there was less industry—quite the reverse; but simply "the growth of homes with women and children in the place of the lumbering camp and the ranch, occupied by men only, all of whom were workers."

In some other States the rapid influx of immigrants, composed chiefly of adult males, has made the increase of workers keep pace with or surpass the increase of population. That influx was larger during the decade from 1870 to 1880 than in any previous period of American history or in the history of any race or nation; and to this must largely be set down the fact that over all the country the number of bread-winners has grown even more rapidly than the number of inhabitants. Agriculture still holds foremost place, but other occupations are making up on it; the rural districts still contain the great bulk of the population, but the towns are now absorbing and developing even more rapidly than the country. A strange and complicated problem is being worked out on a vast scale and on a magnificent stage. It is worth the while of the American people to spare no cost and no trouble to render its operations visible to the eye and intelligible to the mind, and they have spared neither.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

EVENING SESSIONS FOR DEBATE.

Mr. MORRISON. Before I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union I desire to ask unanimous consent that, until otherwise ordered, there be evening sessions for the purpose of debate only.

The SPEAKER. Beginning at what hour?

Mr. MORRISON. I propose that the House shall each evening take a recess say from 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the order to begin this evening?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that from and after to-day there be evening sessions for debate, the House to take a recess from 5 o'clock in the evening until 8 o'clock; not to interfere, as the Chair supposes, with the Friday evening set apart for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir; nor with any other evening devoted to any subject.

The SPEAKER. There is no other evening assigned so far. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Is that order intended to apply during the rest of the session?

The SPEAKER. The request is that it shall be until otherwise ordered.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have the condition inserted that the order shall not interfere with any evenings otherwise assigned.

The SPEAKER. That is a part of the request. The Chair hears no objection and the order is made.

PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of the House, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Patents in relation to the deficiency in room and insufficiency of force in the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY OF ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Paymaster-General asking an appropriation of $275,000, to be immediately available, to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the pay, &c., of the Army for the current fiscal year; which was referred the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MOREY, for one week.

To Mr. JOHN S. WISE, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FORAN, for four days, on account of important business.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS.

Mr. MONEY asked and obtained unanimous consent that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I now move that the House resolve itself in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the tariff bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer a resolution to fix a day for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRISON. I will do so if it gives rise to no debate.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. TALBOTT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following resolution for present consideration:

Resolved, That the session of Saturday, May 10, after the morning hour, be devoted to the consideration of bills and joint resolutions reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs and bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table over which said committee has jurisdiction, except bills providing for the construction of additional war vessels; the bills and resolutions to be considered in the order agreed upon by the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does that confine it to one day only?

Mr. TALBOTT. One day only.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, considered, and adopted.

Mr. TALBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I now renew the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is not an effort to readjust the incongruous details of our present tariff schedules; but, as I understand, it is substantially the first step in a policy which looks to the ultimate reduction of duties to a strictly revenue standard. I shall not, therefore, undertake to point out the particular inequalities and excrescences of existing laws, but, what is more pertinent to the occasion, speak to the principles and methods of protection.

The bill in its logical sequences puts protection as a system squarely on trial; and even if the bill did not, it would be idle to talk of evading or postponing the issue. The unexampled burdens of our customs duties have quickened the masses of the people on whom these burdens fall into searching, determined, remedial investigations; and the agitation thus begun is destined never to cease until the Federal power of taxation is forever brought to its rightful function, the raising revenue for the support of the Government.

Protection is doomed, and the chronicle of its fate will be read at no distant day in the legislation of a Democratic Congress. My purpose is to show the desirableness of this consummation; and I shall proceed to assign some of the reasons why it ought to be accomplished. These reasons, such of them as I shall present, may be conveniently and it seems to me logically grouped under two general theses.

First. Protection lays destructive hinderances on all the agencies of commerce and is monopoly in its worst form.

Second. Protection is an illegitimate and a pernicious use of the right of taxation.

To these arraignments I shall speak in the order of their statement; and at once to the first.

Under pretense of providing revenue protection not only raises and grants bounties, not only extorts from many to give to few, but accomplishes its objects at the expense of widespread and disastrous interference with the natural operations of trade. It is but the repetition of long-acknowledged axioms to say that rational self-interest is the universal motive, and buy where you can buy cheapest and sell where you can sell dearest the fundamental law of exchange.

The propriety of the application of this law to domestic trade none dispute.

The advantages of commercial intercourse undisturbed by factitious restrictions have been strikingly illustrated in the domestic policies of our own people. Under these policies marvelous growths have been developed. Within a few generations a continent has been reclaimed from barbarous habitudes to the highest walks and conditions of civilization; wildernesses have been subdued and their primitive solitudes broken by the teeming and prosperous homes of millions of people. Who will deny that these realizations have been largely promoted by freedom of reciprocal trade between citizens of the different States, and that further progress and development in any State would be retarded by the imposition of duties by that State upon the products of other States?

If freedom of exchange is the natural order of things and beneficial when applied to domestic trade, how does it suddenly cease to be advantageous between citizens and commodities of different nations? Does the mutual advantage of parties to an exchange depend upon the accident of birth or the condition of citizenship? The statement of the question is its refutation. Nationality has nothing to do with the economic fruits of a given trade. Competition if left to its own decisions will determine the question as unnerringly as acts the physical law in obedience to which the needle, while it may move quiveringly, still turns to the pole.

No Congress, however powerful or familiar with the forces of political economy, has either the right or the wisdom to determine for individuals from whom they shall buy or to whom they shall sell. These matters are outside the legitimate province of government, and ought not to be subjected to legislative interference further than the needs of revenue require.

Avarice and selfishness, however, unrestrained by considerations of social duty, are always in conspiracy to raise up factitious enemies to the beneficent principle of competition. At times they instigate capital to obtain, through engrossment, the whole supply of a desirable article, and thus lay outrageous extortions on all whose wants constrain them to become purchasers. At other times they successfully besiege Congresses, under the captivating plea of protecting our own citizens, to lay such duties on foreign products as will enable the home manufacturer to place upon his goods whatsoever prices he will. Each of these contrivances is an enemy to competition; both are monopolies, and of the two the last is the worst. These examples of monopoly, the one being protection as it exists, the other selected for purposes of comparison, differ widely in important particulars. In the one the wrong and injustice are the products solely of individual effort; in the other (which makes them incomparably worse) they are wrought out through the agency of Government. The one is local and transitory; the tendency of the other is to continuous expansion; and expansion, by multiplying the protected industries, serves to enlarge and perpetuate the system. Protection feeds and grows and strengthens on its own vices.

Sturtevant, in his Economics, forcibly pictures the gradual processes in the development of a protective system; and I ask the careful attention of the committee to one paragraph. In it you will recognize scenes that have transpired under your own observation within the walls of this Capitol:

> Let us suppose that up to a certain time free trade had prevailed, when persons interested in establishing some new industry had found foreign competition inconvenient and applied to the Government for a protective duty. The Government grants the request, and the revenue law is modified accordingly. The petitioners go away, for the present satisfied. Let us suppose that these petitioners were manufacturers of woolen cloth. The wool-growers are not slow to discover that on the one hand they are obliged to pay more for woolen cloths, while on the other hand they are severely pressed by the competition of foreign-grown wool. They apply for protection, and it can not be refused. This takes away a part of the value of the privilege conceded to the manufacturers of wool, and they are discontented.
> The principle of protection is now established, and every industry which encounters any foreign competition will demand and can not be denied a share in it. The iron-men of every grade must be protected, and every dime of protection which is granted to them increases the price of machinery for the manufacture of woolens, and thus damages the woolen interest. The cotton-men, too, must be heard. They have to pay higher wages to their laborers, because the cost of living has been increased. Workmen in this climate must have woolen cloth. The cost of machinery is increased, and therefore it costs more to manufacture cotton goods. They, too, must be protected. Soon the woolen interest has lost more by monopolies granted to other industries than it gained by the one originally granted to itself, and it besieges the Government more clamorously than ever for more protection, and with much more powerful argument. It now wants to be protected, not so much against foreign competition as against the monopolies granted to other industries.
> These, one and all, are soon again thronging the lobbies of Congress demanding more protection. The privilege granted to one industry is destructive of that granted to every other, and no man can tell to-day whether his particular industry is on the whole benefited or injured by the protection which actually exists, or whether if the whole were at once swept away his interest would not be actually relieved of an oppressive burden. But all still worship with unfaltering faith at the shrine of exclusiveness, and clamor for more protection as the panacea for all their ills. The coal interest must have protection, however much that may injure the iron interest, and the iron interest must have protection, however that may affect the woolen and the cotton interests. If protectionists could demonstrate some great law of nature by which it might be determined with accuracy when and to what amount protection should be granted, the whole thing might be reduced to order and law and reason; but till that can be done (and it never can be done), it will present a scene of wild confusion, self-contradiction, and self-destruction.

So that protection, in its final analysis, is but a fierce war of monopolies over antagonistic special privileges, and when once inaugurated is illimitable in its possible scope. It permeates all the arteries and veins of commerce and infects the whole economic system with vicious motives and conditions. It teaches men to look to Government aid rather than rely on the capabilities and advantages which nature has given them. It converts Congress into a theater of unseemly strife between pampered interests, each voraciously grabbing for the biggest share in the wicked monopoly of robbing the people.

Monopolies, Mr. Chairman, of all sorts and degrees "infringe the right of exchange, are unjust in nature, and odious in practice." The highest ingenuity of man would be baffled in an attempt to devise one which combines all these iniquities to a greater extent than protection. It is utterly at war with the genius of our institutions, which proclaims, wherever its voice is heard, "Equal protection of the laws to all, unjust privileges to none."

In the second place, protection is an illegitimate and pernicious use of the right of taxation. It is no answer to this charge to say that the courts of the country have never yet held a tariff schedule unconstitutional because of its protective features. It is true that the courts have not, and unfortunately there are reasons why they probably never can review the precise point. Congress has the unquestioned power to lay and collect duties for revenue. If a schedule of duties in any measure effects this end, the motives which influenced the law-makers in the arrangement of the schedule are beyond the reach of judicial scrutiny.

A tariff, therefore, might be construed mainly with a view to protection, and yet the courts of the country be powerless before the gigantic wrong, for the simple reason that the system produces some revenue. This unavoidable impotency, however, of the judiciary to restrain legislative discretion in the selection of means to a lawful end in no way affects the true constitutional principles and methods of taxation, nor does it bring in conformity to them the purposes and devices of protection. It has taught the latter, however, to intrench itself behind the former; and hence we hear of "protection" as an "incident" to "revenue." The employment of these words, in the light of existing practices, is a deceptive characterization of a system whose methods, avowedly adopted for lawful ends, are in reality destined to ulterior and wrongful uses. The alleged incident has notoriously become the chief object, and revenue serves mainly as a pretext for accomplishing protection.

Against this fraud in the use of language I protest. If protection is good, if protection is right, if protection is constitutional, let it stand on its own merits, and not seek, as has been suggested, to lean on something so respectable as revenue. If a huge system of monopolies is to be perpetuated, and fatten on the substance of the land, let it not escape the odium and execrations an appropriate appellation invites.

"Incidental protection," sir, as a designation of our present tariff is hypocritical phraseology, and a practical illustration of that treacherous device which Pollock aptly portrays in the idea of service rendered to the devil in the stolen livery of the court of heaven. It seizes upon a high constitutional right, that of taxation, designed for the beneficent purpose of enabling Government to live, and prostitutes it to the abominable office of extorting from the masses of the people to build up colossal fortunes for individuals. Such a situation is the debauchery of Government.

Taxation justly understood is not unrestrained power of disposition over private property, but power of appropriation limited to a defined end, and even when temperately exercised within the limitation the power is severe and onerous. It takes from the citizen compulsorily a part of his own property and renders no equivalent except the security Government affords for the unmolested enjoyment of that part of his property which remains. This harsh and rigorous power can be effectually confined to the end which justifies its exercise only by subjecting it to one inflexible condition, namely, that the Government shall always, as far as possible, receive the whole produce of the power. The one feature, therefore, which distinguishes legitimate taxes from other accumulations of money is the fact they go into a public treasury and are thence disbursed through prescribed channels. Not so with protection. Its processes are so insidious that they collect from the people without accounting to the Government, and from this fatal vice results two inevitable and prodigious evils: First, the exactions of protection are enormously in excess of the revenue which it yields to the Government, and no adequate return is made to those on whom the exactions are laid; second, of these excessive exactions of protection not a dollar goes into the Treasury, but the whole inures to the benefit of preferred classes.

The attempted accomplishment of these evils by direct methods, while in no whit magnifying them, would at once expose their insufferable enormities. If it were proposed to the voters of this country to raise annually by direct process of taxation vast sums of money and apply them to the building up of private fortunes, the proposition would be indignantly spurned from one end of the land to the other as a monstrous perversion of the right of taxation. To such a wrongful use of a rightful power, if openly attempted, no civilized people under the sun, however abject their political vassalage, would willingly submit. England, grandly historic in her early struggles for human liberty, has been more than once in the convulsive throes of revolution for usurpations of power not more flagitious. And yet, sir, these grievous mischiefs are precisely what protection through its artful contrivances substantially effects. This is made obvious to the commonest understanding by a glance at the nature and practices of the system. Its design is to screen certain branches of home industry from foreign competition. It accomplishes this design by laying such duties on foreign products as will either prevent or diminish their importation.

The effect upon the prices of the home products is to enhance them approximately to the extent of the duties laid on the foreign goods. These artificial enhancements of prices, cruelly extorted from the consumer by operation of law, constitute the exactions of protection in excess of the revenue which it yields to the Government. It is difficult to ascertain the full extent of these exactions. A tariff of any sort, being a charge upon consumption, is necessarily disguised in its operations, and never advises of dates or amounts those upon whom its burdens fall. The only possible security for the tax-payer lies in the principles on which the tariff is constructed. If these principles are strictly revenue, the processes, though still disguised, will work out just results; if, however, protection is the structural idea, the processes become so insidious that the grievous mischiefs stated inevitably follow. Such a system burdens consumption at all conceivable points, nor is there a time when it ceases to call for more. It lays its remorseless touch upon the cradle and reaches relentlessly into the grave.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER] in the last Congress graphically portrayed its monstrous but accustomed details as illustrated in the every-day experience of the farmer.

I quote from his remarks:

Here is a statement showing a few of the burdens of the farmer: Under this tariff he rises in the morning, puts on his common flannel shirt taxed 95 per cent.; his coat taxed 57 per cent.; shoes taxed 35 per cent.; and hat taxed 92 per cent.; takes the water from a bucket taxed 35 per cent., and washes his face and hands in a tin bowl taxed 35 per cent.; dries them on a cheap cotton towel taxed 45 per cent. He sits down to his humble meal and eats from a plate taxed 50 per cent., with knife and fork taxed 35 per cent.; drinks his coffee with sugar taxed 68 per cent., seasons his food with salt taxed 69 per cent., pepper taxed 61 per cent. He looks around on his wife and children, all taxed in the same way; takes a chew of tobacco taxed 199 per cent., or lights a cigar taxed 118 per cent. And, sir, even the sunlight from heaven that pours into his humble dwelling must come through window-glass taxed 59 per cent.; and yet he thinks he lives in the freest government under heaven. Then he starts to work, puts a bridle taxed 35 per cent. on his horse, and takes his horse that has been shod—the nails used in shoeing being taxed 59 per cent., driven by a hammer taxed 20 per cent.—and hitches him to a plow taxed 45 per cent. with chains taxed 58 per cent.; and after the day's labor is closed and his family are all gathered around he reads a chapter from his Bible taxed 25 per cent., and kneels to God on a humble carpet taxed 51 per cent.; and then he rests his weary limbs on a sheet taxed 45 per cent., and covers himself with a blanket that has paid 104 per cent. Nor do these grasping manufacturers stop here, but even the broom with which his good wife sweeps the floor is taxed 35 per cent., and the cooking vessels used in preparing her husband's frugal meal are taxed 42 per cent., and the soda used to lighten his bread taxed 59 per cent. She sits down to her sewing with a needle taxed 25 per cent. and a spool of thread taxed 74 per cent., to make a calico dress taxed 58 per cent.; or if she wishes to knit warm socks, to protect her husband and children from the bitter cold, she uses yarn taxed 120 per cent.; and thus daily and hourly must the hard earnings of the laborer go to satisfy the manufacturer and add to his ill-gotten wealth.

I repeat it is difficult to tell the full measure of the excessive exactions of protection. They are susceptible, however, of approximate estimation, and were computed by the distinguished Senator from my own State, Senator COKE, in his able speech to the Senate February 8, 1882, which has so honorably associated his name throughout the country with the subject of tariff reform. The following is his estimate:

During the fiscal year just closed the value of dutiable merchandise imported into this country from abroad, as the Treasurer's report shows, was $448,061,587.95. Upon this merchandise was collected at the custom-houses $193,800,897.67, being an average of 43¼ per cent. This is the entire revenue of the Government derived from the tariff for the last fiscal year. Now, what amount do the manufacturers receive from the tariff? By the census of 1870 it was estimated that $4,000,000,000 worth of manufactured articles were consumed annually in the United States. The figures for 1880 are not yet published so as to be accessible, but following the ratio of increase in population and everything else, they must now amount to at least $5,000,000,000 each year. All these manufactures being increased in cost to the consumer by the amount of tariff duty, which, as I have before stated, is an average of 45 per cent., which goes to manufacturers, it is easy to see on that basis what the share of the manufacturer would be. But I will discount that per cent. so as to more than cover all contingencies and all drawbacks, and say they only receive under the tariff 25 per cent. on the sum total of manufactured articles consumed in the United States, and it amounts to the enormous sum of $1,250,000,000 annually; and the amount increases each year with the population and trade of the country.

So for the year 1881 the results of tariff taxation and the distribution of its proceeds may be tabulated thus:

Revenue received by the Government	$193,800,897 67
Bounty received by manufacturers	1,250,000,000 00

So that for every single dollar paid into the national Treasury under the existing tariff six and a half dollars, at the lowest calculation, go into the pockets of the manufacturers. If this vast sum of money were collected annually from the pockets of the people directly to be given to the already richest class of people in this country each year its monstrous iniquity would of course be so apparent as to defeat it. But it is collected indirectly, though as surely, in an increased price of everything they consume, in everything they eat, drink, and wear; in every tool and implement they work with; in every article which enters into the construction of the houses they live in, whether used for strength or utility or ornament; in every book or newspaper they read. This tax is as all-pervading as the atmosphere they breathe, and they have been so accustomed to it that they neither feel nor appreciate its enormity.

Applying the plan of Senator COKE'S calculation to the year 1880, the statistics of which year have been published since his speech was made, we find that the aggregate receipts from customs were $186,522,065. The dutiable imports on which these receipts were collected amounted to $459,652,883, the average rate of duty being 40.57 per cent. The total value of domestic manufactures for the same year was $5,369,579,191. From these domestic manufactures the Government of course derived no revenue, still the tariff burdens were laid on the consumer in enhanced prices.

Let us concede, however, as did Mr. Senator COKE, "to more than cover all contingencies and drawbacks," that the enhancement of prices was only 25 per cent. instead of the full rate of the duty, 40.57 per cent.; the amount would then be $1,073,915,738. To summarize these figures, the tariff yielded to the Government in 1880 a revenue of $186,522,065, while it exacted from the people over and above what the Government received $1,073,915,738. In other words, for every dollar of revenue that the tariff carried into the Treasury it placed in the pockets of the manufacturers $5.77. The vast aggregate of these bounties, had they been raised by a direct per capita tax, would have required an assessment of $21.39 on every man, woman, and child in the land.

Mightier, more iniquitous burdens never rested upon a tax-ridden people. And yet the beneficiaries of these stupendous bounties, with an effrontery equaled only by their greed, unblushingly proclaim that the movement now going on for the relief of the people from these unparalleled burdens ought not to be countenanced because it disturbs the business interests of the country. They seek to intimidate the men engaged in promoting this great movement for popular relief by denouncing them as reckless agitators. To this impotent denunciation I have but to reply that if the words be divested of the reproach they abstractly imply and characterize only the real services performed no worthier epitaph could mark the grave of the public man of this generation than that he was "a reckless agitator."

There is no escape from the conclusion which the figures I have submitted demonstrate except in the denial of the fact that tariff duties enhance the prices of the protected products. This denial is sometimes resorted to and sought to be established by comparing the present prices of certain manufactured products with the prices of the same products years ago. The infirmity of the proof lies in ascribing to the tariff that which is entirely the effect of other causes. If these reduced prices were caused by protective duties the reduction would be local and confined to our own country, whereas we know that the prices of manufactured products are diminishing the world over, and nowhere to a greater extent or more rapidly than in free-trade England. The real causes of reduced prices are to be found, therefore, in other conditions than the tariff, conditions not peculiar to America, but common to other countries.

Among these conditions may be enumerated new discoveries in the arts and sciences, increased facilities for transportation, and particularly modern improvements in machinery, which have so largely lessened the percentage of human labor in all manufactured products.

If the truth is to be ascertained by comparison, "the truest comparison," as was said by Robert J. Walker, "is between the present price of the same article at home and abroad; and to the extent that the price is lower in the foreign market than in our own the duty, if equal to that difference, must to that extent enhance the price, and in the same ratio with the lower duty."

But a single question ought effectually to silence the miserable sophistry that tariff duties lower prices. If tariff duties do not raise the prices of domestic products, how do they protect the home manufacturer? If these duties do not enable the home manufacturer to charge more for his goods than he could otherwise do, in what conceivable way do they protect him?

But it is said that while the immediate effect of the duties is to enhance prices, the ultimate result is to lower prices by stimulating competition and thus increasing production at home. That the prices of home products can never be thus permanently reduced below the prices of foreign products is evidenced by the most familiar of commercial phenomena.

Let us suppose, for argument's sake, what could happen in few if any cases, that strong competition through a series of years has at last resulted in such increased production at home as to lower home products below the prices of foreign products. What would be the consequence? Why, simply this: The home manufacturer would begin and continue to carry his products abroad until the diminished supply left at home would raise the price here at least to the level with the prices abroad. But let us pursue this imaginary case a step further. We have now reached the point where increased production at home under tariff stimulation has begun to reduce prices of home products below the price of foreign products, and where the home manufacturer by shipping his goods abroad has so counteracted this tendency that enhanced prices reappear in the home market. The farmers of the country now come to Congress with their grievances. They tell us, and with a great deal of force, "Protection was originally put upon us under a promise that we should be ultimately compensated by a home market in which we could buy our supplies cheaper than they could be procured abroad. Relying upon this promise we have submitted for long years to high artificial prices, and now when the increased production for which we have been burdened so grievously is about to result in the low prices promised, the home manufacturer defeats the promise by shipping his goods abroad. We demand that these shipments be stopped, and insist that good faith requires it. We demand that such duties be laid on exports as will prevent domestic manufactures from going abroad, and thus secure to us the promised benefits of the home market."

I ask protectionists who advance this argument of ultimate low prices will you be willing ten or fifteen years hence when the state of things described has been reached to compel the fulfillment of the promise you make to-day by so amending the Constitution as to authorize Congress to place an embargo in the shape of duties on the exportation of our manufatured products?

Mr. Chairman, common intelligence was never insulted by a more flagrant solecism than that tariff duties lower prices. This sort of reasoning, however, reveals the desperate poverty of argument to which protectionists are reduced. To compress the outrageous absurdity into a single sentence; they ask that laws be enacted to raise prices, and then justify the laws on the ground that they lower prices.

Closely allied to this fallacy, that tariff duties lower prices, is the argument that protection compensates those upon whom its exactions are laid by the increased home demand which it creates for their products. This home-market argument is addressed mainly to the farmers, and proceeds upon the theory that protection diversifies our industries, and thus engages in manufacturing pursuits persons who would otherwise devote themselves to agriculture. To this there are two obvious and conclusive answers:

First. Agricultural classes are not the only ones upon whom the exactions of protection are laid. The countless multitudes of laborers employed in other pursuits of life are equally victims. Professional men of all kinds, merchants with their innumerable clerks and assistants, and the thousands employed in all the varied agencies of transportation, are forced to bear their parts of the burdens. The merchanic who pushes the plane and wields the hammer swells the cruel tribute by the enhanced prices he is compelled to pay, not only for the clothing for himself and family, but for the implements of his trade. Without going further into details, let each individual of the classes enumerated deduct for himself 25 per cent. from the prices he pays for clothing, household furniture, implements of trade—in a word, for all the manufactured goods he uses—and he will then have an approximate idea of the amount he contributes to the manufacturer's fund.

The second reply to the home-market argument is that the alleged advantages of protection in this respect are in no measure answerable to its exactions. As the argument is based upon the idea of equivalency, before it can be allowed any force it must be shown that the advantages which protection brings to the farmer in the way of providing a home market for his products are in some measure commensurate with the contributions it exacts from him.

By an equal per capita distribution among all the people of the United States of the excessive exactions of protection, as I have computed them, the proportion of these exactions paid by the farmers would be $473,810,729. Now what are the farmers profited by the increase which protection makes to the home demand for their products? Let me concede what no one, of course, could claim, that this increase is the aggregate of the agricultural products consumed by the employés in the protected industries, and then how stands the account?

The estimated value of farm products in 1880 was $2,212,540,927. Of these $685,867,737 were exported, leaving to home consumption $1,526,672,190. The whole number of laborers, including those dependent on them, to whom manufacturing, mining, and mechanical industries furnished employment was 7,711,983, being 15.37 per cent. of our population. This percentage of farm products consumed at home would be $234,648,515. So that the account for the year 1880 of the farmers against protection would stand thus:

By home market	234, 648, 515
Balance	239, 162, 214

If, therefore, the farmers of the country were relieved of the burdens of protection they could suffer to rot in their fields every dollar's worth of their products now consumed by all the employés in all the manufacturing establishments in all the land and still be gainers to the extent $239,262,214 annually.

But, sir, it is not protection that secures to the farmers the home demand they have for their products or any considerable part of it.

The persons invited into manufacturing employments by high tariffs are not all drawn from agriculture; on the contrary, by far the larger part are diverted from commerce, from navigation, from land transportation, and other pursuits. The diversion of these persons into manufacturing industries does not add anything to what would otherwise be the home demand for farm products.

Again, let it be remembered that a large part of the manufacturing industries of the country would be carried on without the aid of protection, not, it is true, with such enormous gains to the manufacturer, but still at reasonable profits. Nature has provided for America manufacturing resources unsurpassed by those of any other country. We have a healthful and temperate climate; food supplies can be produced nowhere else at lower cost; inexhaustible mountains of coal and iron abound here in close proximity; nor does an ocean lie between us and the raw materials of cotton and wool. The Southern States now produce more than one-half of the entire cotton crop of the world, while Texas and other parts of the Union can grow wool in competition with the most favored countries of earth.

Add to these natural advantages the inestimable boon of free and stable government, and we have a combination of auspicious conditions in the face of which it is idle to insist that all needful manufacturing enterprises can not be profitably conducted. The real increase, therefore, which protection makes to the home demand for agricultural products is small.

The plea that tariff duties lower prices is simply a fallacy and the home market argument flatly contradicted by facts. My position, then, is impregnable that the exactions of protection are enormously in excess of the revenue it yields to the Government, and no adequate return is made to those on whom those exactions are laid.

What becomes of these excessive exactions is the next inquiry. And this brings me to the second evil which I charge to a protective use of the right of taxation, namely, that of the excessive exactions of protection not a dollar goes into the Treasury, but the whole inures to the benefit of the preferred classes.

It will be instructive, as it is pertinent in this connection, to note the number of persons engaged in American manufactures and the numbers engaged in other pursuits. The following table gives these facts:

TABLE 1.—Showing numbers of persons engaged in the different industries in the United States in the year 1880.

Agriculture		7,870,493
Professional and personal services		4,074,238
Trade and transportation		1,810,256
Total agricultural, professional services, and trade		13,754,987
Manufacturing, mining, and mechanical:
Employés	2,718,805
Proprietors	1,118,307
Total manufacturing, mining, and mechanical		3,837,112
Total		17,592,099

TABLE 2.—Showing whole numbers of persons engaged in and dependent on the different industries in the United States in the year 1880.

Agriculture		22,120,319
Professional and personal services		11,714,938
Trade and transportation		5,996,201
Total agricultural, professional services, and trade		39,831,458
Manufacturing, mining, and mechanical:
Employés	7,711,983
Proprietors	3,412,342
Total manufacturing, mining, and mechanical		11,124,325
Total		50,155,783

This second table is formed by distributing the unemployed population proportionally among the several occupations.

The table shows that of the whole population of the United States but 22.17 per cent. are engaged in manufacturing, while 77.83 per cent. are employed in other pursuits. Now if the enhanced prices of domestic products caused by tariff laws were distributed among all the persons engaged in manufactures we should still be confronted with the startling fact that more than three-fourths of the people of the United States are annually paying coerced tribute to less than one-fourth. But even this statement does not reveal the hideous mischief in its full proportions. For of the 3,837,112 persons engaged in the protected industries only 1,118,307 are owners of the manufacturing establishments. The last may be said to represent 3,412,342 persons, and this comparatively small part of our population, less than 13 per cent., are the exclusive beneficiaries of the protective bounties. In confirmation of this I have tabulated certain figures from the statistics of the last census. They relate to the three leading industries of cotton, wool, and steel, and are designed to show how much of the profits of these industries go to capital and how much to labor.

In making these tables I have followed the plan adopted heretofore by gentlemen in both ends of the Capitol; that is, from the total value of products I have deducted the sum of labor and materials, and assumed that the remainder represented the gross profits of capital. Of course there are incidental expenses, wear and tear of machinery, interest, insurance, and other items not embraced in the tables. The most liberal allowance, however, may be made for all incidental expenses, and the net profits of capital will then appear vastly out of all just proportion to the wages of labor. The first table relates to cotton manufactures, and is as follows:

Table showing gross profits to capital invested and wages to labor employed in manufacture of cotton goods in the United States in census year 1880.

Capital invested		$219,504,794
Value of products		210,950,383
Paid for materials		113,765,537
Paid for labor		45,614,419
Number of employés		185,472
From products		$210,950,383
Deduct materials and labor		159,379,956
		51,570,427
Deduct further estimated salaries to 2,115 officers and clerks		2,115,000
Leaving gross profits to capital		48,455,427

The deductions for salaries is my own estimate as to the amount. I make the allowance because the item of "labor" in this table does not embrace salaries. So that while the gross profits to capital were 22.20 per cent., labor received but $4.54 per week or 76 cents per day, and that counting only the six working days to the week.

Mr. CHACE. Will the gentleman excuse me for interrupting him a moment?

Mr. WELLBORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. I would ask the gentleman where he gets these figures?

Mr. WELLBORN. From the census reports.

Mr. CHACE. Does the gentleman understand that the census reports do not pretend to give all the expense of labor in the cotton-factories?

Mr. WELLBORN. Some of them do; in reference to cotton they do not. The gentleman means, I suppose, the salaries of officers, &c.

Mr. CHACE. No; not that.

Mr. WELLBORN. I understand it does give all the expense of labor except the salaries of officers and clerks, and for those I have made an allowance of $2,115,000.

Mr. CHACE. If the gentleman understands that, he understands what is not so.

Mr. WELLBORN. Very well; then it is a contest between the gentleman and the Census Bureau.

Mr. CHACE. Not at all; the Census Bureau does not pretend to do so.

Mr. WELLBORN. And if the gentleman puts his opinion against the authority of the Census Bureau they can decide the matter between them. [Applause.]

Mr. CHACE. The Census Bureau does not pretend to give any such thing.

Mr. WELLBORN. Oh, I am not surprised that the gentleman smarts under this criticism of protection—not at all surprised that he should do so.

The next table relates to the woolen manufactures:

TABLE 3.—Showing gross profits to capital invested and wages to labor employed in manufactures of woolen goods in United States for census year 1880.

Number of employés		86,504
Capital invested		$96,095,564
Value of products		160,606,721
Paid for materials	$100,845,611
Paid for wages and salaries	25,836,932
		126,682,543
Leaving gross profits to capital		33,924,178

So that the gross profits to capital were 35.3 per cent., while labor—including salaries as well as wages—received but $5.73 per week, or 95½ cents per day, counting only the six working days to the week.

The last table relates to the now famous Bessemer and open-hearth steel works. And it is fine food for reflection for the protectionists who are advocating the perpetuation of this system of bounties.

Table showing gross profits to capital invested and wages to labor employed in Bessemer and open-hearth steel works in the United States for census year 1880.

Number of employés		10,835
Capital invested		$20,975,999
Value of products		55,805,210
Paid for material	$36,826,928
Paid for labor	4,930,349
		41,757,277
Leaving gross profits to capital		14,047,933

This table shows that the gross profits to capital were 66.97 per cent., while labor received only $8.75 per week. The figures of this last table are taken from the official report of Mr. James M. Swank, secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association, who was the special agent of the last census for the compilation of iron and steel statistics. These figures were used by Senator BECK and the present distinguished Speaker of this House in their tariff speeches in the last Congress. They presented such a startling exhibit of the magnitude of protective bounties that Mr. Swank sought by subsequent explanation to break the force of the conclusions which had been drawn from his own statistics. This explanation he made in a letter written on the 25th of April, 1882, to Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, which letter was incorporated by the last-named gentleman in his speech to the House a few days subsequently. I quote from the letter:

The Senator [meaning Senator BECK] erred in confounding "labor and material" with "capital and labor," and assuming that the sum of the first two items is exactly equal to the sum of the last two, namely, $41,757,277. * * * The mistake made by the Senator and others, that the "total value of all products" ($55,805,210) produced by the Bessemer and open-hearth steel works of the United States in the census year 1880 (see page 36 of the Census Report on iron and steel) was obtained with an invested capital of only $20,975,999, would not have occurred if they had reflected that these products were not made solely with the machinery and other aids and appliances of the works mentioned, but that they were the final result of successive preparatory operations and processes of manufacture, which may have represented in the census year an invested capital of $100,000,000.

The $20,975,999 expresses only the capital invested in machinery and accessories required in the immediate conversion of pig-iron and other raw materials into Bessemer or open-hearth steel, and does not include the capital invested by Bessemer and open-hearth steel manufacturers in iron and coal mines, in limestone quarries, in blast-furnaces, in founderies and machine-shops, in car works, in brick-yards, in lateral railroads, and in other enterprises necessary to the production and handling of these raw materials. The capital in these various contributory enterprises is separately given in the Census Report on iron and steel, and in other census reports. To illustrate the full significance of the distinction which is here made, but which Senator BECK and others have not made, it may be stated that in the census year 1880 the proprietors of the then existing eleven Bessemer steel works of the country operated forty-nine blast-furnaces, most of which were large, and the construction of which had cost a great deal of money.

The statistics of these blast-furnaces, including the capital invested in them, necessarily appear in connection with the statistics of other blast-furnances. They could not be combined with the statistics of Bessemer and open-hearth steel works, because their product is pig-iron and not steel. We may also add, as illustrative of the large investments which our Bessemer steel manufacturers find it necessary to make in iron and coal mines, the statistics of which will be found in their proper connection, that one Bessemer steel company in Pennsylvania has recently invested $1,500,000 in an iron mine in Michigan. To say that the whole capital invested in the production of Bessemer and open-hearth steel in this country is represented by $20,975,999 is as erroneous as to assume that the whole capital of the farmer who grows his wheat is represented by the cost of his thrashing machine."

The explanatory matter here asserted is, that in addition to the capital invested in the Bessemer steel and open-hearth works, there is other capital invested in contributory enterprises, which ought to be included in the item of "capital" before the rate per cent. of profit of the Bessemer steel and open-hearth works can be correctly ascertained.

The letter in connection with the census reports shows this assertion to be erroneous. Under the plan by which Mr. Swank compiled his iron and steel statistics, the several processes which eventuate in the finished product of steel are classified as separate industries. Indeed, as a matter of fact, they are often, if not generally, owned and operated by separate and distinct companies. In his report, for instance, Mr. Swank says "that of the raw materials used by the iron and steel works at least one-half of the iron ore and limestone, nearly all of the anthracite coal, and fully two-thirds of the bituminous coal and coke were purchased from independent producers. Under each of these industries, thus separately classified, are given the four items of "capital invested," "value of product," "value of materials," and "paid for labor."

The item "value of materials" embraces the cost of the products of the antecedent and contributory processes. So that to determine the rate per cent. of profit in any one of the several processes the calculation should be confined to the capital invested in that particular process. The whole capital invested in all the processes could properly be taken into account only in a calculation to show the rate per cent. of aggregate profit in all the processes. Whether the Bessemer steel and open-hearth companies owned and operated contributory processes or whether these contributory processes were owned and operated by other associations in no way affects the capital invested in the Bessemer steel and open-hearth establishments. The item "materials" includes all the products of these contributory processes, and such contributory process has its own separate and distinct profits.

The simile with which Mr. Swank undertakes to dispose summarily of this question of profits furnishes an apt illustration of the errors of his position.

He says, as already quoted: "To say that the whole capital invested in the production of Bessemer and open-hearth steel in this country is represented by $20,975,999 is as erroneous as to assume that the whole capital of the farmer who grows his wheat is represented by the cost of his thrashing-machine." The obvious response to this is that to say that the capital invested by the Bessemer and open-hearth steel companies in the process of manufacturing steel is represented by the whole capital in all contributory processes is as erroneous as to assume that the capital which the farmer who thrashes his wheat has invested in a thrashing-machine and the labor necessary to the single process of thrashing is represented by the whole capital invested in his farm and all the antecedent processes of growing the wheat.

There is one other paragraph in this letter which I desire to read, and to which I invite the careful attention of the committee:

Having now shown that the excessive profits referred to by Senator BECK, Mr. CARLISLE, Mr. Dunnell, and others were not realized by our Bessemer and open-hearth steel manufacturers in the census year 1880, we now frankly admit that the profits realized by most of these manufacturers in that year were more satisfactory—

Well, I guess they were. He goes on—that they exceeded the 2 or 3 or 5 or 6 per cent. on their invested capital which, less daring, less enterprising, and very jealous men would have conceded to them. They did not, fortunately, conduct their extensive business operations in that year at a loss, as many of them had done in previous years; nor were their profits so small that at the year's close it became a question for consideration where they could borrow the necessary money, by placing mortgages on their works, to enable them so to enlarge the capacity of those works that the increased demand for their products could be met in succeeding years. They neither lost money nor received as a rule small profits, but on the contrary most of them realized handsome profits; and they immediately invested these profits in extensions to their works, with the result that the capacity of these works is to-day twice as great as it was in the census year, assuring a prompt meeting of the country's demand for their products, and at much lower prices than then prevailed.

Now, bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that this letter was written on the 25th day of April, 1882. Remember, further, that the extensions of the works referred to were made solely out of the profits of one year's business, and then you can realize fully the force of the astounding admission that the capacity of the works was "twice as great then as it was in the census year." That is to say, the invested capital out of the profits of one year's business had approximately doubled itself. Mr. Swank writes a letter to disprove the charge that the profits of the Bessemer and open-hearth steel works in 1880 were 67 per cent.; and before he finishes his letter unwittingly confesses that these profits were in the neighborhood of 100 per cent. Verily may it be said to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], in reference to this explanatory letter which he adopts and incorporates in his speech: "Thy own mouth condemneth thee. * * * Yea, thine own lips testify against thee."

What these tables show of cotton, woolen, and steel establishments is equally true of all the protected industries, namely, the great bulk of the tariff bounty goes to the owners of the factory and shop, and not to the laborers employed in them.

I have a table here giving this general result.

Table showing profit to capital invested and wages to labor in all manufactures in the United States for census year 1880:

Number of employés		2,718,805
Capital invested		$2,775,412,345
Value of products		5,341,838,890
Paid for materials	$3,381,701,277
Paid for labor	941,325,925
		4,323,027,202
Leaving gross profit to capital		1,018,811,688

So that while the gross profits to capital were 36.71 per cent., labor received but $6.65 per week—$1.10 a day.

In the light of these figures how utterly unfounded and false the plea so philanthropically urged by protectionists that their system is for the benefit of the laboring man, that it increases wages and elevates and dignifies American labor.

Mr. Chairman, the truth is tariff laws do not enhance the wages of labor, and for the simple reason that they are legislative gifts to manufacturers. It is needless to explore the fields of political economy in quest of matter to disprove the plea when such a complete answer lies at the threshold of the investigation. If tariff augmentations of prices were the legitimate fruits of the joint operation of labor and capital they would be equitably shared by these two agents of production, for in that event the distribution would be effected by a law higher than municipal regulation, competition. It can not be too often stated nor too strongly emphasized "that competition," as some one has forcibly put it, "is no device of man, but a permanent law of nature. It as naturally bears sway in all the transactions of exchange and in the distribution of wealth between the parties concerned in producing it as the law of gravitation controls the movements of the planets in their orbits." Whenever natural forces are left to their own action competition always allots to capital fair earnings and to labor just rewards.

Enhanced profits, however, caused by tariff laws are not legitimate fruits of production. They are pure, unmixed bounties. They are beyond the reach of competition. They obey the law of their bestowal and go only to those on whom they are conferred. These enormous bounties, aggregating yearly hundreds of millions of dollars, are remorselessly laid on the farmer, the mechanic, the merchant, the lawyer, the doctor, the banker, all other classes, for the exclusive benefit of the manufacturer. They convert 87 per cent. of the whole population of the United States into "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the small remainder. They work on a gigantic scale, and without compensation the coerced transfer to a few the private property of many millions.

No wonder that these many millions have grown impatient and wrathful under their grievous burdens. The mildest amiability can not do otherwise than characterize the system which curses and afflicts them as a scheme of legalized plunder. Its iniquities have at last exhausted forbearance, and an outraged people are on their march to final deliverance.

Mr. Chairman, I have now hurriedly sketched, as was my design, the nature, the practices, and the results of protection. The conclusion of my argument is that protection is a scheme of such odious monopolies and such monstrous perversions of the right of taxation that it ought to be utterly destroyed. Congress should not content itself with the superficial work of removing excrescences and leveling inequalities, but should enter at once upon a policy, as does the Morrison bill, which looks to the ultimate reduction of duties to a strictly revenue standard.

The inherent vices of protection are such as not to admit of mere correctives or ameliorating remedies. If we would escape its wrongs we must destroy the system. And this, Mr. Chairman, is the great issue now on trial before the American people. It ought not to be evaded and can not be postponed. Party alignments are rapidly forming on it. Above the strongholds of protection wave Republican banners. Against these fortresses of iniquity the Democratic party is putting in motion its columns. Yea, the struggle has already begun.

Mr. Chairman, of the memorable revolutions and civil commotions which stand out as landmarks in history the grand ones are those which had their origin in popular resistance to arbitrary perversions of the powers of government. Of these grand struggles none has yet been fought which more strongly challenges the approval of the civilization of our age than the one now waged by the American Democracy for the freedom of commerce and the integrity of taxation. The result of the contest can not be doubtful. On such an issue the Democracy will ultimately triumph. Commerce will be rescued from the merciless clutches of monopoly and taxation emancipated from the wicked uses of protection. To freedom of person and freedom of opinion, so gloriously asserted in our first Revolution, will be not less gloriously added freedom of exchange. The three, freedom of person, freedom of opinion, and freedom of exchange, accordant and harmonious, will unite in one, and together form the noblest fabric of human freedom which on this planet has yet been built. Though differing in the nature of its results and methods of achievement, this great victory for the people, while not less beneficent in character, will be broader in scope than was the triumph of the colonial arms of '76. The latter gave civil liberty to scattered and feeble colonies; the former will secure commercial freedom with the world to a compact and mighty Republic. Millions of the living hail with joy the approach of the victory; generations yet unborn will gratefully inherit its benefactions. [Great applause.]

When Mr. MCKINLEY had spoken for one hour,

The CHAIRMAN said: The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust the committee will extend the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKINLEY then resumed and concluded his remarks. [See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. 1372) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

TARIFF REDUCTION.

The Committee of the Whole House resumed its session, and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may have the attention of the House while I endeavor to reply to the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY]. It is an eloquent plea for the present situation. The people are burdened with taxes, the Treasury is overflowing, money is still accumulating in Government coffers, and the people are complaining of hard times, but the gentleman from Ohio is satisfied to let things stand as they are.

His speech is a fair sample of the arguments on his side. He begins by putting us in a position we do not occupy. He calls us free-traders. The Democracy were in possession of the Government for more than a third of a century and never enacted free trade. He says the free-trade policy is to tax tea and to tax coffee. Under the Democratic tariff of 1846 coffee was free and tea was free. Under the Democratic tariff of 1857 coffee and tea were free. The Democratic party always collected a revenue by tariff taxation. That tariff always necessarily afforded incidental protection, and yet he calls us free-traders. A similar thread of sophistry ran all through his speech, and he closes naturally by an appeal to prejudice. His effort seems to be to confuse the real issue presented to the country by the Morrison bill. It was quite an oratorical success when the gentleman held up with such gusto (as if that were an argument) an advertisement which I believe he says came from some English house.

Mr. MCKINLEY. It is an advertisement in a trades journal; the advertisement of an importing house. That is all it is.

Mr. HERBERT. Suppose it to be so——

Mr. MCKINLEY. It is.

Mr. HERBERT. What does it mean? That Mr. Speaker CARLISLE has had his face pictured upon some earthenware made in England? Is that an argument in favor of retaining the present high duties upon the cheap class of crockeryware consumed by the poor people of this country? Why, Mr. Chairman, a Republican Congress in March, 1883, passed a bill which pretended to be a reduction of taxation, but which on this very article of earthenware raised the duties, compelling poor people to pay higher prices for the earthenware they use. Mr. CARLISLE opposed the bill. An importing house now advertises crockery in Carlisle shapes. The gentleman from Ohio holds up the advertisement and seems to think that is an argument in favor of continuing these high taxes. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, if Mr. Speaker CARLISLE should be instrumental in bringing down that iniquitous tariff, raised to higher than war rates on earthenware and many other articles, as it was, he would deserve to live in bronze and marble for his efforts in behalf of the rights of the people.

But earthenware was raised and the tariff on other articles was raised, say these gentlemen, in order that home manufacturers might have the home markets. As the counterpart of this proposition, a large portion, and apparently the most effective part, of the gentleman's speech was upon the value of this home market to the American farmer. He says 90 per cent. of all the farm products of this country are consumed in America, and his argument is that we are indebted to protection for that. What are the facts? His figures are as erroneous as his conclusions. I have made some calculations which are here before me upon the figures of 1880. I selected that year only because the census shows how much the farmers of this country produced. The figures, which I took from the reports of the Government statistician, show how much was exported.

I hunted up these figures for myself to be sure I was accurate. I took none of them from second hands. The entire farm products of the United States in 1880 amounted in value to $2,213,000,000. I use round numbers for the sake of convenience. Of this sum we exported farm products amounting to $683,000,000; so that, deducting exports from products, we have consumed by the entire population of the United States $1,530,000,000, not quite 70 per cent., instead of the 90 per cent. of the gentleman from Ohio. And we find that the much-despised foreigner furnished us a market for $683,000,000 of our agricultural products. In other words, the paupers, as they are called, whose cheap goods it is the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio to prohibit our farmers from buying, actually buy from our farmers more than 30 per cent. of all they produce.

Now, how much to the farmer is the value of the home market furnished by the manufacturing, mechanical, and mining classes all put together? They constitute but 22 per cent. of the population. Not one-third of them are in any manner protected, as it is called, by these prohibitory laws. Taken all together, the laborers in all these industries are, as I shall attempt to show, injured by the shackles the law has placed upon their industry. This is the table I have taken from the census returns: All occupations, 17,392,099; agriculture, 7,670,493; personal and professional services, 4,074,238; trade and transportation, 1,810,256; manufacturing, mechanical, and mining, 3,837,112. These, with the women and children and others dependent upon them, constituted our population. Those in the fifth class constitute, as I have said, only 22 per cent. of the whole. That fifth class comprises brick-makers, builders and contractors, bakers, butchers, carpenters, masons, and a hundred other occupations whose workmanship finds no competition with imported articles. Largely more than half of those embraced in that class can never by any possibility find their products competing in this country with the foreign article. But embrace them all, and they constitute but 22 per cent. and consume but $336,000,000, or 15 per cent. of what the farmer makes, while the foreigner furnishes a market for 30 per cent. If those who seek to compel the farmers by law to buy all their goods from them at their own prices could only buy all the farmer's produce at prices fixed by the farmer, there would be some reciprocity. But all the surplus cotton and wheat and bacon and other produce must be exported and must compete with that produced by labor abroad, and the foreign market and the home market act upon and regulate each other. Foreign demand is the only relief for a surplus at home. But what relief for the farmer do gentlemen on the other side suggest? Two remedies have been proposed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] wrote a letter, I believe, recently to the West, urging the farmers there to turn their attention to sorghum—to making sorghum sugar. Now, how much sugar is imported into this country? Ninety-one million dollars' worth. That supplies our wants. Suppose the farmers of the country make, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks they can, sorghum sugar and molasses and supply the country just as cheaply as it can be supplied by importation, what would be the result? This new industry would take off ninety-one millions from our exports, and would leave still about five hundred and ninety millions for foreign consumption. The agriculturist would still have no relief. He would still have to compete in foreign markets.

Then comes my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], my colleague on the committee, with his little remedy. He says if we only raise the duties high enough we will eventually produce at home all the manufactured goods now imported, that we would thereby support 700,000 more laborers, and that they with those dependent upon them would be three and a half millions of people. Mr. Chairman, how long would it take this country to increase three millions and a half in population? By natural increase and immigration just about three years. So, if to please my friend we should raise a Chinese wall around us so high that we could import no dutiable goods and should produce them all at home, we would give occupation to just the number of people who will be added to our population in the next three years. And how much of what the farmer has to dispose of would they consume? Giving them just as much per capita as the farmers consume, the answer is $106,000,000; so that, if, following the plan of our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], we compel our Western farmers to raise sorghum and make all the sugar we want, and then, following the plan of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], we raise duties so high that we could import nothing, but must make everything at home, you would thus get consumers for 197,000,000 of farm products. But as you had $683,000,000 surplus, that would leave you about $486,000,000 still undisposed of, and the farmers of the West and of the South would still have to look abroad for purchasers.

You can not dodge these facts. They can not be evaded. To export our agricultural products is an absolute necessity, unless the gentleman perhaps would recommend our farmers, after they shall have made $91,000,000 worth of sorghum sugar and after having fed away $106,000,000 worth of products to Mr. RUSSELL'S 700,000 laborers, who are to make all the goods that are now imported, to put the whole surplus of $466,000,000 worth of produce into peanuts and to stay at home to eat them. [Laughter.] Besides our agricultural exports the foreigner buys from us more than five and a-half million dollars' worth of timber and more than three millions in rosin and turpentine.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these propositions, I hope gentlemen will excuse me for saying, are simply absurd; but they are made by the ablest advocates of war-tariff taxation. If practicable what would they lead to? Direct taxation. If we imported nothing we should collect no revenue at our custom-houses, and just in proportion as the law is prohibitory and tends to give the home manufacturer the home market, just in proportion as the consumer is compelled to buy at home more high-priced goods, just in that same proportion will he have imposed upon him the additional burden of internal taxation. I ask you, gentlemen, have those who seek to monopolize the business of selling manufactured goods to the American consumer become so greedy that they are unwilling to let the American citizen pay at least a portion of his taxes in the price of his goods, or are you determined he shall pay all that price to you and then pay his taxes besides?

But the gentleman from Ohio said we had advanced more rapidly in manufactures and otherwise since the adoption of a high tariff than before. Is that so? I propose to answer him with other figures, not even put together by myself, but by the Superintendent of the Census, General Walker. I refer you to a table in the second volume of the census—that volume devoted to manufactures. That table furnishes a complete and unanswerable reply to everything said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], and to all that can be said on that subject.

It shows, in the first place, that from 1850 to 1860 manufactures advanced more rapidly than during any previous decade. It shows, secondly, they advanced more than at any subsequent decade. Here it is:

The per cent. of increase in the gross value of manufactured products for the decade from 1850 to 1860, which I shall call the first decade, was 85 per cent.; in the second, from 1860 to 1870, it was 79, and in the third, from 1870 to 1880, it was 58 only.

The percentage of increase in the net value in the first decade was 84, in the second 63, and in the third 41 per cent. The capital invested and wages paid increased in a somewhat like proportion, though the number of hands fell off as machinery improved and increased in value. But the advance of wages during that first decade, according to this table, was greater than it was in either of the two following decades. Here are the tables, prices in 1870 reduced to gold:

The country developed as never before or since under that Walker tariff system, a system that necessarily afforded some protection. Every wisely prepared and properly adjusted tariff will do that. This Committee on Ways and Means in reporting the pending bill reported no free-trade measure. It is simply a reduction that we propose, and that is all. The difference between the present law and the bill we now propose is simply the difference between the very high protective tariff and a lower tariff, still affording protection. That is the issue and the only issue before this House.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman state how much it is proposed to reduce the whole amount of the collections?

Mr. HERBERT. I have not the figures at hand, but some $31,000,000 in round numbers. The figures are appended to the report.

But, going back and taking the same census returns for the period between 1850 and 1860, the farm values advanced throughout the United States as follows: In the first decade 103 per cent., and in the second decade—that is, from 1860 to 1870—only 10 per cent. That reduction in the latter period of course was due largely to the war and the destruction of the labor system of the South, and it would be manifestly unfair to compare those two periods.

But in 1870 the labor system of the South had become settled. We were then producing more cotton than we produced before the war, getting more money in gold for the crop than before the war, and exporting millions of dollars' worth of timber more than before the war; so that it is fair to compare the advance of the whole country from 1870 to 1880 with that which took place between 1850 and 1860; and yet, Mr. Chairman, the advance in the values of farms between 1870 and 1880 was only 39 per cent., while under the Walker tariff, from 1850 to 1860, the increase was 103 per cent.

Now, sir, there is no answering these figures if the census returns for which we paid so many millions of dollars are worth anything, for these figures are furnished by that bureau, and if they prove anything at all they do prove beyond a doubt that a low tariff is better for manufactures, better for farms, and better for the whole country and every industry in it, than a high tariff. Yet these gentlemen say that we must adhere to this war tariff, now nearly twenty years after the close of hostilities; for that is the issue made by the bill—whether we will adhere to war-tariff taxation or reduce it.

We have had two war tariffs in this country. In 1812 Congress raised the tariff by adding 100 per cent. to then existing duties. In that law it was provided that the increase should cease two years after a treaty of peace. But after the treaty of peace the people who had their fingers in the pockets of others procured the repeal of the limitation and the high duties were continued. There ensued just such a struggle as we are having now. The people wanted relief from war-tariff taxation, the manufacturers wanted it continued. The people were paying the taxes, the manufacturers were eating them. History is but repeating itself. During the late war high rates were necessary to raise immediate revenue. The Morrill tariff, which was a distinctly protective tariff, was imposed in March, 1861.

The bill now pending before this committee reduces nothing below the rates fixed in that law. We present a measure of moderate reduction, one that should command the support of every citizen, whether protectionist or not, who is not in favor of war taxation in time of peace. In August, 1861, after hostilities had begun, war rates were imposed. In December, 1861, there was a further addition to the duties. In 1862, in order to raise still more money, an internal-revenue tax was imposed on domestic manufactures. Then, in order to compensate for these duties and prevent dangerous foreign competition, higher tariff rates were imposed. These internal-revenue taxes soon after the war were repealed, but the war tariff was allowed to remain substantially untouched, and continued substantially unchanged until 1870. Then, in 1870, there was a revision. That revision did take off about twenty-eight millions of tariff duties. The principal protected article to which the knife was put was sugar, but that did not grow in New England. The other substantial reductions were made mostly by putting on the free-list articles which did not grow in this country and the tariff upon which simply put money in the coffers of the Government and not in the pocket of any favored citizen. It was not really relief from war-tariff taxation. And now let me call attention to the fact that the changes made in that revision of 1870, just like the changes made in the revision of 1883, were all, wherever deemed practicable, in the direction of substituting specific for ad valorem duties.

These specific duties gradually became prohibitory. That is the general effect of that system. That is why our friends on the other side are so much in love with it.

I will take up a book of tables here compiled by a Government statistician, Mr. Charles Evans, in which he classifies, arranges, and calculates upon the duties from 1867 to 1878. I select, as an illustration, table No. 427.

If we examine this table we get a clear idea of the operations of the tariff, and how the decline of prices at home and abroad, continually going on as processes of manufacture improve, operates under specific duties gradually to exclude the foreign article, give the home manufacturer a monopoly of the market, and shut off all revenue. In this table the duty is what we call a compound duty; but the ad valorem duty is but light, 15 per cent. The heaviest part of the duty is the specific, 6.5 cents per square yard. That specific duty remains the same whatever the price of the cloth. If the price per yard should be 13 cents, then 6.5 cents would be 50 per cent. If the price should fall to 6.5 cents per yard, then 6.5 cents duty would be 100 per cent. Now look at the table. The foreigner cheapened the price per square yard, which is the unit of value, from 17.5 cents per yard in 1867 down to 13.1 cents per square yard in 1878. But we see the ad valorem duty rose from 52 per cent. in 1867 to over 64 per cent. in 1878.

In the mean time the foreign article was gradually being driven out of the market. We collected $871,000 duties in 1867 to help pay taxes. In 1878 we got only $68,000. Now, what of the price the consumer was paying for the home manufactured article? It was, of course, nearly or quite 21.58 cents per yard in 1878, which is the amount of the duty added to the price of the foreign article. This must be so, because there was still $68,000 worth imported during that year, and there would have been no importation if the home-made article had been selling very decidedly lower. By this table we see at the end of that twelve years the home manufacturer is very nearly in possession of the home market. To give him absolute control of it is what our friends over there say they desire. That was the purpose of the revision of 1883. Here is the table:

Duties on jeans, denims, drillings, bed-tickings, &c., and exceeding five ounces to the square yard—printed, painted, or colored—over 100 and not over 200 threads per square inch, counting warp and filling.

1878	813,885.50	106,306 00	.....do.....	68,848 47	.....	.131	64.76

Now, what does that mean? Let me go back to the table. Suppose 13.1 cents to be the lowest price at which the foreigner can lay that cloth down in an American port; with duty added it would cost 21.58 cents. Let us suppose the American supplies the market at 20 cents; there will then be not a yard imported. The consumer is paying 7 cents a yard more for his common cotton goods than he could get it for abroad; the Government is losing $871,000 revenue annually; and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] is happy because the home manufacturers control the home market.

Mr. McCarthy, of the Ways and Means Committee, in 1870, when the bill revising the tariff was up for discussion, said that they had put into it as largely as possible specific duties; and now you can see exactly what made that tariff gradually more and more prohibitory. Do you gentlemen of the Democratic party remember that in 1876, when we attacked that tariff, in our platform we arraigned it as a masterpiece of injustice? We said it yielded a gradually dwindling revenue. That is just what it did.

Our customs revenue was, for 1873, $184,000,000; 1874, $160,000,000; 1875, $154,000,000; 1876, $145,000,000; and the revenues continued to diminish until the great financial boom of 1879–'80 came and caused an abnormal increase of imports.

That was the effect of that tariff; that was the intended effect of making the duty specific. And precisely that same course was taken—that is to say, specific duties were further substituted for ad valorem rates in this revision, this so-called reduction of 1883. I say, and the figures show, that there was not even a substantial temporary reduction of rates.

It is sometimes said that the tariff ought not to be a political question; that it ought to be adjusted on business principles. Perhaps, sir, that is so; but, sir, so long as there are two parties in this country, one of which relies on the masses of the people for support, and the Democracy is such a party, and while the other party has its source of strength, as the Republican party has, in the organized monopolies of the land, just so long will the tariff question be a vital political issue until it is settled on the basis of fairness and justice to all people and all classes. We can not avoid the issue unless we abnegate the rights of the people who sent us here. Where do parties now stand? In 1876 the Democracy assailed the tariff. Tilden was elected by the people, but defeated by the Electoral Commission.

In 1880 we again arraigned the tariff. That time we were defeated at the polls. But how was it done? By bribery in Indiana and bribery and illegal voting in New York city and Brooklyn. But there was probably another reason. The tariff question did perhaps injure us in that campaign because we did not fight the battle upon our platform. We dodged the issue in the discussion which, in my opinion, we had made, even too sharply, in our declaration of principles. I do not believe that when revising and reducing the tariff we ought entirely to disregard the existing conditions of the industries of the country. That is not the intention of the Democratic party; and yet the platform of 1880 was so worded as to allow ingenious orators to make it appear that, regardless of consequences, we intended to cut down tariff rates at once to the revenue point.

There was another reason. When we made that issue in 1880 it was precisely at the time of the great revival in our financial condition. From January 1, 1879, to November 1, 1880, $160,000,000 had been added to the currency. The tidal wave of prosperity was almost on its curl. The Republicans said to the workingmen: "You are fully employed; your wages have advanced; do you want a change?" And to the farmers: "You are getting good prices for your wheat and your bacon, and all your produce; do you want a change?" The people were slow to see that their prosperity was in spite of a high tariff; that it was the result of their own industry, their economy, their wonderful natural resources, their bounteous crops, their timber and turpentine, and a wide foreign market, which had poured into our lap the shower of gold which, with the remonetization of silver, had brought about the long-deferred resumption of specie payments.

Sir, cast your eye back over the history of our country. It is written everywhere the people never yet indorsed a proposition for industrial reform while in the midst of prosperity. If you would have the workingman listen to you as you advocate reform, go to him when wages are falling off, when mills are on half-time.

Go to him now, when his employers have had the tariff increased on woolens and have not increased his wages. Go to him now, when the tariff has been increased on earthenware, on fine cotton goods, on hosiery, on silks, all on the pretense that it is for the benefit of labor, and when not a single manufacturer of earthenware, of cotton goods, of hosiery, or of silks has increased the wages of labor, and he will lend you his ear. And now is the time to talk to the farmer. He is getting 75 cents for wheat that last year was worth $1.15. Still he must export.

Russia is extending her wheat-fields. Servia is increasing her products. India is becoming a dangerous competitor. Still he is absolutely bound to meet all competitors in a foreign market. If he tries Judge KELLEY'S advice and fills this land with sorghum sugar, that would equal in value but one-seventh of his present surplus. Mr. RUSSELL'S remedy, importing three and a half millions of people to consume his produce while they make his goods at high prices, would take but a fraction more. While the sun shines and the rain falls and the American farmer works, we will have a vast surplus with which to seek the markets of the world. We hedge ourselves about by a high-tariff wall to keep out the manufactures of England, France, and Germany. England is seeking a pretext to keep out our cattle. France and Germany hunt excuses to exclude our bacon and pork, and our Republican friends would build our wall higher, hem in our farmers, and tell them they must raise sorghum or die. Mr. Chairman, there is a remedy, and we must point it out to the people. Lower these high walls that shut us out from the world. Unfetter labor and give it a chance. Now is the time, now is the golden opportunity for industrial reform. Let us begin it at once, moderately, but firmly and wisely.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that in 1876 and 1880 we made the tariff issue. I have shown how we were cheated in one of those campaigns and why we failed in the other. The Forty-seventh was the very first Congress for eight years in which the Republican party had possession of both branches. As soon as they saw that Congress was theirs they were faced with this question: "Shall we dare to make another Presidential campaign without having revised the tariff?"

The answer came up from all over the country everywhere, "No, you dare not risk that issue again." On the one side the tax-payers were demanding relief from war-tariff taxation; on the other, those who were profiting by this taxation demanded its continuance. The party was in a predicament. The question was how not to do it and yet appear to do it. This was the task to which the Forty-seventh Congress addressed itself. They began by consuming the whole of the first session debating the question of a tariff commission. This they established and sent it roving over the land. Then they went to the country in the Congressional elections of 1882, and the people, doubting whether they would make a tariff revision at all, sent this Democratic House here with a large majority.

Then we came back here to the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress. The Republicans were absolutely obliged to make a pretense of passing a bill reducing tariff taxation. They therefore commenced work in both ends of the Capitol, and they finally passed the Senate bill. Congress never before recognized a tariff bill as having rightfully originated in the Senate. When that bill came before this House the majority dared not submit it to a vote for fear that the Democrats, combining with certain Republicans, might agree to the Senate bill. They therefore devised a rule, unheard of in all previous parliamentary history, that a vote in favor of sending the bill to a conference committee should count in favor of sending it there, and a vote against the proposition should not count at all. In that way they got it into the juggle of a conference committee, and the conference committee reported the bill, which was passed.

They now say that that bill was a reduction. A reduction in what? Look over it and you will find in the first place that all through the bill, from the beginning down to the very end of it, duties were reduced on goods that were not imported or imported only in small quantities, but whenever they came to such a thing as a basket clause, a "not-otherwise-provided" clause, under which the Government was getting a large revenue, they raised the duties on that.

For the sake of illustrating how they proceeded throughout I take up the cotton schedule. Here are fifteen articles on which they lowered duties, and in nearly every case the amount imported is small. Certain it is that they seldom missed an opportunity of making an apparent reduction when they could do so and still leave the duty prohibitory. The very largest item in the whole list is where the imports amount to $13,121,000. They raised the rates on that item from 35 per cent. to 40 per cent. Mr. Chairman, I have carefully noted throughout the whole bill, so far as the tricks of new changes and classifications will permit, the items raised and the items lowered. I could point them all out, but have not the time. Suffice it to say that in almost every case where the duties were raised imports were coming in freely and paying handsome revenue to the Government. The object of raising the duties was, of course, to prohibit importations.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], who was a member of the Ways and Means Committee in that Congress, and himself a manufacturer, said in his speech on this bill, "If present rates," the rates of 1883, "are maintained, it is hoped we shall rapidly reduce the importation of 'manufactured goods.'" Now, of course, he knows what he is talking about, and he boldly proclaims that it is the hope of those who framed the bill, which it is claimed reduced tariff taxation, that it should prove prohibitory—in other words, that it shall reduce revenue, not by lightening the burden of the consumer, but by preventing him from importing goods. That is the purpose of that law. But there are things about it darker still. New classifications were imported into it which have actually deceived the Government statistician himself, and even my friend from Massachusetts. I refer now to the 3½ cents per square yard rate in the cotton schedule. That is a new classification so adroitly put in that the statistician, Mr. Evans, in calculating the rates, estimated that there had been a reduction on the class of goods covered by it. In point of fact it covers goods, cheap goods in common use, which were formerly dutiable at 35 per cent. ad valorem and are by this bill raised to, some of them, as high as 140 and 150 per cent. Here is a table showing cost prices and rates of duty:

I have here samples of these goods [exhibiting]. The gentleman from Massachusetts said in his speech the other day this was an accident. I do not see him in his seat at this time; I wish he was. He is mistaken; it was not an accident. Senator BECK, on the 2d of February, 1883, as will be seen by reference to the RECORD of that session, part 2, page 1950, called attention to this very thing. Again, the gentleman says these goods are not manufactured in this country. This is true as to tarlatan and Swiss mulls. But as to the black crinoline linings, there are three firms engaged in their manufacture: Andrew McLain, of New York; the Irving Manufacturing Association, of Staten Island; and R. & S. Adams, of Paterson, N. J.

But I can not dwell on these particulars. In the woolen schedule is an item which comprises women's and children's dress goods, goods that run from 18 cents up to 30 cents per square yard. By the tariff of 1883 the duties on those goods are raised from about 50 per cent. away up to over 100 per cent.

Here again the Government statistician was deceived by the new classification into computing that there was a reduction of the duty from 68 per cent. down to 64 per cent., when there really had been an increase of the duty.

"For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" commend me to the tariff bill of 1883.

You have all seen, I suppose, the tables showing the imports and exports and the reductions or the increase of duties for the first six months after the present tariff law went into operation. That table showed that, taken altogether, even upon this calculation where the Government statistician was in many respects deceived, there had been a reduction of perhaps 1.40 per cent. I do not undertake to give the exact figures.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. One and seventy-four one-hundredths per cent.

Mr. HERBERT. Now, it should be remembered that this bill was passed March 3, 1883, and was to go into operation on the 1st of July. Therefore importers rushed in rapidly goods of the classes upon which the duty would be raised. In fact, the imports for the month of June were increased about $10,000,000 over the amount imported for the month of May. Goods upon which the tariff was made more prohibitory were brought in as rapidly as possible before the new duties took effect. All this is to be taken into consideration, and in view of this and the other facts to which I have alluded we are bound to conclude that there was absolutely no reduction at all—not even 1.74 per cent.

But since that table has been made it tells so strongly against the work of the last Congress upon the tariff that Mr. Nimmo, the statistician of the Government, for whom I have the highest respect, has been put to work, at the request of some of our Republican friends, to see whether he can not get up figures to explain his own figures. He has been at that work now for about two months. I have called on him day after day to ask for those figures, but I have not been able to get them.

How is he to proceed? He proposes, or rather he is asked, to account for the failure of the Republican Congress to reduce duties as it pretended to do, by asking us to take into consideration the fact that goods have fallen in price, and that as goods declined in value the ad valorem duty, as I have heretofore explained, rose. This, it will be claimed, accounts for there not being any greater reduction. Now, I wish it distinctly understood that I have no imputation to make against Mr. Nimmo on account of this one-sided, short-sighted calculation upon which he is engaged and has been so laboriously for the past two months. I have no idea he would ever undertake, of his own accord, any such lame excuse for the failure of the Forty-seventh Congress to carry out its promise to the people. He has doubtless been requested to figure out the results that would follow if certain facts are considered and all others left out of the calculation. If I were going to give Mr. Nimmo a sum I should ask him to calculate what would have been the result if the Forty-seventh Congress had done what it professed to do, reduced duties 20 per cent. It certainly would not take two months to tell me. As it is, by getting information from merchants about the fall in the price of goods, and ignoring the fact, if he shall do it, which everybody knows, that the same class of goods have not been imported this year as last, that the goods on which rates were raised were rushed in before July 1, and that those on which the duties were lowered were held back till after July 1, 1883, he may make a few cents difference. But no statistician can get around the fact that the calculation made by his bureau on the same imported goods, the goods imported in 1883 under the old law and under the new law, made a difference of only 2.38 per cent., and that difference would have been still less, probably nothing, if the calculator had not been deceived by the occult classifications, some of which I have pointed out.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that though the tariff may remain stationary, the general ad valorem goes down a little every year. This has been the case, I believe, every year since 1880. Why is this? Simply because the system of specific duties, as I have explained, gradually squeezes out the higher-rated goods, and only those on which the duties are low can get in at all. There would have been a reduction of the general ad valorem rate that year, even if the tariff had not been touched.

Mr. Chairman, the present arguments of the gentlemen who desire to hold on to war-tariff rates is absolutely incompatible with their position in former times. In 1864, when the House was being urged to adopt the proposed high tariff, Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, said:

This is intended as a temporary measure, a war measure, and we must as such give it our support.

Again he said:

Protection was never defended on any other ground than that in the end the consumer obtained his supplies more cheaply.

In 1870, after a glowing picture of the progress we had made in our iron and steel industries, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said:

A few more years of such wonderful progress and we will produce from our own coal and iron our entire supply of iron and steel, and compete with England in supplying the demands of the world. * * * Keep your duty high enough to induce other men to build furnaces and rolling-mills, and before five years [the Italics are mine] you will find American iron cheapened to the level of the markets of the world, and that without a commensurate reduction of wages.

In the light of his speech in the RECORD of to-day, what a prophet he was!

Sir, no one can deny the benefits arising from competition. If manufactures are maintained here and at the same time maintained abroad, if our tariff is put low enough to allow us the benefits of competition at home and competition abroad, the competition of nation with nation and of manufacture with manufacture will be of avail to lower prices. There is no doubt of that.

But, sir, to shut out by a high tariff all foreign competition, to give the home market absolutely to the home manufacturer, breeds monopolies that rob the people, rob labor of its hire, and impede and delay the development of our resources.

Take the Bessemer Steel Association, composed of the eleven companies engaged in that business in America. For the purposes of monopolizing and controlling the American market all these companies are one. I think it was in 1872 they paid the Vulcan Works of Saint Louis at the rate of about $70,000 per annum to lie idle. A tariff of $28 per ton, imposed upon the pretense that it was for the benefit of American labor, enabled them to turn hundreds of laborers out of employment.

Take another specimen. A new process of making steel directly from the ores was invented in England—the Thomas-Gilchrist process. It was, as Mr. Wharton, a member of the Bessemer Steel Association, admitted before the Ways and Means Committee on the 5th February last, "a better and cheaper process" than the Bessemer. It is believed to be adapted to the ores in Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia. Southern men were negotiating for the patent, which had been sent over from England for sale. The Bessemer Steel Association stepped in and purchased it for $225,000.

This was more than two years ago, perhaps three. The process Mr. Wharton admitted had not proved to be adapted to the ores owned by the members of the association. They had tried it, but so far it had not proven a financial success. But they have not tried it and have not permitted it to be tried in the South. Let gentlemen remember that this point was made on this floor two years ago, and the attention of the country called to it. Then let them turn to the testimony of Mr. Wharton, to which I have referred, and read it fully. Let them see how he avoids and is not prepared to answer fully in reply to the questions with which he is pressed, and then let them read carefully the letter appended to his testimony and sent to the committee after his examination, as the best evidence he could produce that the process had not been withheld from Southern fields, and they will be driven to the conclusion that the Bessemer Steel Association have never intended that the process should be used where it would develop the resources and add to the wealth of the country.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE BESSEMER STEEL COMPANY, LIMITED,
Philadelphia, October 29, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your application for a license for your company to use the patents owned by this association, and relating to the Basic process, I have the pleasure to report as follows:

This association will grant you a license to use the patents referred to at $1 per ton royalty, an advance payment of $50,000 to be made at the time the license issues as royalty on the first 50,000 tons of metal treated under the license.

Hoping the above will prove satisfactory, I am, very truly, yours, &c.

JNO. M. KENNEDY, Secretary,
Per ROBT. F. KENNEDY.

H. S. CHAMBERLAIN, Esq.,
President Roane Iron Company, Chattanooga, Tenn.

Certainly it was never expected that the Roane Iron Company should pay $50,000 in advance for the privilege of trying an experiment, when no exclusive right to any district or territory was applied for, and of course the proposition was not accepted. What gentleman can defend before the people a prohibitory tariff that fosters such monstrous monopolies as this? And who can defend a tariff framed, as it was claimed, with so much of tender solicitude for the rising cotton industries of the South, which raises the duty on card-clothing and all cotton machinery?

Our Republican friends, when years ago they desired to encourage the production of beet-sugar, permitted machinery for that purpose to come in free. When they wish to encourage cotton manufactures they raise the tariff on cotton machinery, and machinery constitutes half the plant of a cotton-mill.

But, Mr. Chairman, to go back to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania made in 1870, that high tariffs induce home competition, and home competition gradually brings down prices toward the level of the foreign article. This is precisely the proposition to which the Morrison bill furnishes a square, fair answer. It meets these gentlemen on their own ground. We say to them, "You have had this high tariff for twenty years, and if during that time you have brought down the price of home-manufactured goods more nearly to the level of the foreign article, then as a matter of course you can afford the reduction of one-fifth now proposed."

On the other hand, if you have not been able during all these twenty years to bring down prices more nearly to the level of the foreign articles, if prices abroad have fallen just as rapidly as they have here, and if the gap that separates your prices from theirs is just as wide now as it was then, so that you can not now stand so moderate a reduction as one-fifth, then the very foundation argument upon which you base your system is a sham and a fraud, and to keep up the duties will be simply to compel the people of America to pay high prices for goods forever.

The Morrison bill is framed to compel the defenders of the present tariff to take one horn or the other of this dilemma.

It was said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] who addressed the committee this morning, that we could not find any perfectly accurate mode of ascertaining how much protection costs the consumer. I think we can, provided we take as true the assertion of the manufacturers and their friends that a reduction of one-fifth the duties would enable the foreigner to undersell them. If this be so, then they are selling their manufactures to the American consumer at a price at least equal to the price of the foreign article with four-fifths of present duties added. If this be the price we are paying them for their wares, then let us estimate how much of any home-manufactured article we consume and calculate how much four-fifths of the present duties on the home consumption of that article would be, for that, according to these gentlemen, is the increased price we are paying, and we can come exactly at the result.

I have prepared a table based on the figures for 1880. I take that year because we have the exact amounts of products given in by the manufacturers themselves. Then I get from the reports the amounts exported. Deducting these exports from the amounts manufactured, we have the amounts consumed at home. Then I get from the Government reports the average ad valorem rates on each class of manufactures. I take four-fifths of this rate as representing the increase of price, which, according to the friends of the present system, the manufacturers are compelled to have in order to live, and thus I arrive at the result.

Here is the table, which shows the amounts the tariff compels American consumers to pay on each of the following classes of goods, according to returns of the census of 1880, on the hypothesis that manufacturers would be undersold if present duties should be reduced one-fifth:

HOME CONSUMPTION.

On the items alone of earthenware, glass, cotton, wool, iron, and steel, altogether it foots up $277,703,000 as the amount over and above the above the cost price of foreign articles the people of this country pay to home manufacturers of those articles, unless these manufacturers are telling you an untruth when they say they can not stand 20 per cent. or one-fifth reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the gentleman's time be extended until he concludes his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. HERBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a vast sum it takes annually to pay these protected industries. If any farmer, now getting about 75 cents for his wheat, wishes to calculate how much this system of protection costs, let him get a copy of the Compendium of the Census; let him take all these protected industries and let him make a calculation in this way, and then he will arrive at some idea of the amount he is paying for the benefit of this home market. Then let him remember that the price of his wheat and bacon is regulated largely by the foreign market, while the price he pays for his goods is regulated by law, and ask himself whether he is in favor of that law as it stands.

A good deal has been said here about wool. Our Ohio friends, I think, have taken a mistaken view of that question.

Let us look at it a moment. The wool raised in Ohio in 1880 was 25,003,756 pounds. At 30 cents its value would be $7,501,127. According to the table I have given, the whole United States paid that year $128,177,441 bonus on manufactures of wool alone. Ohio's population is one-sixteenth of the whole population of the United States, so that would make it that Ohio paid a bonus on home-made woolen goods for the year 1880 amounting to $7,690,646, not one dollar of which increased price went into the Treasury. In other words, Ohio could afford to give every pound of wool made in Ohio for the privilege of buying her woolen goods alone for that year in the cheapest market. She would make about $190,000 by the operation.

Mr. EATON. That is if your figures are right.

Mr. HERBERT. They are right provided the Census is correct and the ad valorem duties given by the Government statistician are correct, and provided always the manufacturers are correct when they say they must have more than four-fifths of the present duties to prevent themselves from being undersold; but just here I feel myself bound to admit that I do not believe those manufacturers are correct in their statements who say the country can not stand the moderate reduction of one-fifth the duties. The most intelligent cotton manufacturers of the South tell us they could get along better with absolute free trade.

There were Ohio farmers before the Committee on Ways and Means who said that wool-growing had not been profitable for several years past. If it be not a profitable production, why then let it stand in the way of tariff reform at this very time when we have a golden opportunity to appeal to the people to decide the question?

Mr. Chairman, I have a sympathy for the wool-growers. There is no doubt they were cheated by the woolen manufacturers in the tariff of 1883. The Morrison bill recognizes that fact, and as it limits the reduction of wool to the figures of the Morrill tariff of 1861, it reduces the duties on wool very slightly—not more than half as much; in fact, not half as much, when we consider the 60 per cent. limitation, as on woolens. Wool, it is true, has fallen in value; so has everything else. But a tariff that should admit a freer importation of fine wools that can not be grown in this country to mix with our coarser wools will certainly have a tendency to make the demand better for common wools.

Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I do not believe we can or ought to come suddenly down by a step that would create distress among our industries from the present system, but we must come down. That is denied to-day, but it has heretofore been admitted by all, even by the greatest men in the Republican party.

I send to the desk and ask to have read an extract from a speech made by General Garfield on this floor in 1870.

The Clerk read as follows:

I hold that a properly adjusted competition between home and foreign products is the best gauge by which to regulate international trade. Duties should be so high that our manufacturers can fairly compete with the foreign product, but not so high as to enable them to drive out the foreign article, enjoy a monopoly of the trade, and regulate the prices as they please. This is my doctrine of protection. If Congress pursues this line of policy steadily, we shall year by year approach more nearly to the basis of free trade, because we shall be more nearly able to compete with other nations on equal terms. I am for a protection that leads to ultimate free trade. I am for that free trade which can only be achieved through a reasonable protection.

Mr. HERBERT. Garfield was subsequently compelled by his associates practically to recede from that position, and now the Republican party seems committed to the maintenance of war-tariff rates forever.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] who preceded me criticised the Morrison bill, said it would be impossible, or at least difficult, to execute such a law. His first point was that there must be experts to classify and experts to value the same piece of goods. There are, and always have been, in the custom-houses experts to do that precise thing. It is necessary now under the present law to count the threads to the square inch, to weigh, to measure, to value, and to classify. All that is necessary under the general provisions of the Morrison bill is to get the duty under the present law and strike off one-fifth. That is the real difficulty with the gentleman from Ohio. He is unwilling to strike off that one-fifth. Where the Morrill tariff operates the pending bill provides a ready mode of determining classifications. I do not believe there would be found a single case unprovided for. If so, it would drop into the unprovided-for clause. But those clauses too are reduced one-fifth, and there comes in the gentleman's difficulty again. His purpose is to give the home manufacturer absolute control of the home market.

The British Parliament, by the navigation act, passed in 1651 and amended in 1660, sought to do the same thing to secure what it called a home market for the colonies. It prohibited them from shipping their products anywhere else but to Great Britain.

Bancroft, in his history, says this was one of the mainsprings of the Revolution. But the British Parliament defended it on precisely the same grounds the protectionists now use to justify similar restrictions—restrictions which prevent us from buying of anybody but them. The navigation act was passed, the preamble said, for the purpose of "maintaining a greater correspondence and kindness between the subjects at home and those on the plantations," and after reciting several reasons which were intended to show that those restrictions were for the benefit of the colonists Parliament winds up the preamble by justifying itself on precedents, "it being the usage of other nations to keep their plantation trade exclusively to themselves." That is what the American monopolists want to do, "keep their plantation trade to themselves."

It is claimed that all this is for the benefit of the American laborer. There never was a more hollow pretense. That is conclusively shown by the fact that though the law of 1883 raised the duty on many classes of goods, and though the manufacturers of these goods were before the Committee on Ways and Means and were cross-examined, not one of them as I remember had raised wages. But it is claimed that the high tariff has raised wages. The truth is that for the last thirty years wages have been advancing at home and abroad—in protective America, in free-trade England. It is part of the progress of civilization.

Consul Lane, March 31, 1883, writing from England and arguing for protection, says:

The tendency of the English workman's social life within the sphere of that quality is upward. His recreations and general surroundings are gradually getting better, his observation larger, and his ambition stronger.

Consul-General Merritt, London, November 30, 1883, says in an article which is carefully prepared to make English wages as low as possible:

On general principles I should judge that the great difference hitherto existing between wages in the two countries is lessening rather than increasing.

Consul Shaw, writing December 6, 1883, says that in England the wages of cotton weavers and spinners, reckoning from 1850, had advanced, up to 1860, 16.85 per cent.; to 1870, 43.59 per cent.; to 1877, 64.47 per cent.; to 1883, 74.72 per cent.

testified before the committee on the relations between labor and capital:

I worked in England for upward of seventeen years as a mule-spinner and a piecer for the mule-spinner (that is simply an assistant), and my opinion of the workmen in that branch of industry, relatively in the United States and in England, is that the English spinner is in a far better condition.

I might multiply extracts but will not take the time.

The condition of the laborer is improved and will continue to improve because he is better educated, better fed, has better machinery, can produce more and find a wider market for his products. When you free the American laborer from those onerous restrictions which now fetter and cramp him; when you give him access to the markets of the world and let his best customer, the American farmer, prosper; when you take away from his employer the privileges of monopoly, of combining and regulating production at will, and thus turning labor out of employment, he will take care of himself, for no one who studies the question can fail to see that, after all, to labor organizations much of the improved condition of labor is due.

Adolph Strasser, president of the National Cigar-makers' Union, testifies before the committee on capital and labor:

The wages in England are higher than they are in Pennsylvania. In the State of Pennsylvania the average wages among the cigar-makers is from $2 to $6 a week, the lowest in the United States. The cigar-makers in that State are the poorest paid in this country. They work cheaper than the Chinamen of San Francisco, and they do not receive even that wages in cash; they have to take it in scrip and truck.

THE TRUCK SYSTEM.

Several years ago I tried to organize the cigar-makers of Pennsylvania. I went to Quakertown, in Berks County. I found that the cigar-makers at the end of the week received a note from the employer which was good in the grocery store, and as soon as the grocery-man had $100 of those notes he delivered them back to the manufacturer at a discount of 10 per cent.; in other words, the manufacturers were buying back their own notes at a discount of 10 per cent., and the cigar-makers very seldom saw any cash.

The difference between the wages of farm laborers in America and Europe is greater than the difference between the wages in the same countries of labor in the skilled industries. All labor is akin, and if the laws of man will but permit the laws of God to operate more freely and our boundless resources to be fully developed, the American laborer in the field and in the workshop, on land and sea, will take and keep his place in the vanguard of civilization.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, had come to no resolution thereon.

BUSINESS FROM THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 17th of May, after the reading of the Journal, be assigned for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the Judiciary; this order not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation or revenue bills, or prior special orders, and to continue in force until one day has been occupied by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill, and I hope we shall be able to conclude it to-day. Pending that motion I move that all debate on the substitute offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] be limited to twenty minutes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for invalid and other pensions; and the Clerk will report the pending substitute, proposed by the gentleman from California, upon which, by order of the House, general debate has been limited to twenty minutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the whole paragraph commencing with line 23, and insert the following:

"That from and after the 1st day of July, 1884, the duties now by law devolving upon pension agents shall be performed by paymasters of the United States Army, to be detailed for that purpose and stationed at such places as may be deemed most advantageous for the convenient, effective, and economical execution of the work by the Commissioner of Pensions and the Paymaster-General of the Army, under such regulations as they may prescribe, subject to the approval of the President. And the Paymaster-General of the Army may assign to perform duty under the foregoing provision any officer of his Department now on the retired-list of the Army who may be deemed suitable, and who, while doing such duty, shall be allowed full instead of the three-fourths pay he is allowed on the retired-list: Provided, That the pay of officers detailed for these duties and the allowances for clerk-hire, stationery, postage, office-rent, and messengers shall be those authorized in the Pay Department, and no more."

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the substitute offered by the gentleman from California has been subject to consideration in the Committee on Appropriations, and while they recognize the substitute as possessing very considerable merit, they do not deem it expedient to make so radical a change in the payment of the pensioners as that substitute contemplates, lest there may be confusion, consequent delay, and disappointment, to the prejudice of the pensioners, many of whom are to a large extent dependent upon the little pittance they get from the Government for their daily sustenance. For these reasons and upon the conclusions reached by the Committee on Appropriations I did not deem it necessary or desirable to protract the discussion any longer, and therefore I suggested that debate be limited to the length of time which has been indicated by the chairman.

I do not wish to occupy the attention of the committee further than, as I have done, to state the conclusion of the Committee on Appropriations, and very briefly to state the reasons that induced that conclusion.

I will yield now a portion of the time, or such portion as the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] may desire, if he wishes to address the committee further upon the substitute which he has offered.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Mr. Chairman, I submitted that amendment to the Committee of the Whole at our last session and gave the reasons which then occurred to me why that change would be just to the service, and I spoke of the economy of expense that would result from the same. I have now to state that a further consultation with the Paymaster-General confirms the statements which I made in committee, to wit, that the disbursements can be made so as to save $84,000 in the next year's expenditures, on the hypothesis that the same number of paymasters are employed as there are agencies now, and on the further hypothesis that four of these paymasters shall be taken from the retired-list. But if a less number of paymasters will suffice, and it is the belief of the Paymaster-General that a greatly reduced number will answer the purpose, then the economy will be largely increased.

Now a word with regard to the question whether there will be any difficulty that will impede in any manner the regularity of the payments as they are now being made by the pension agencies, provided the committee shall think proper to adopt this amendment. On that question I have the assurance of the Paymaster-General that within three weeks after the passage of the bill, or after notice that preparations were to be made for that purpose, there would be no difficulty whatever in having every payment made as regularly and as completely as it now is, to the entire satisfaction of the recipients of the pensions.

I have one more remark to make. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] asked me what was the average cost of payments made during the war. I find that in a disbursement of one thousand millions of dollars and upward, including all losses by casualties, by the defalcations of officers, and by the failure of a bank in which there were deposits, the entire cost of losses and expenses of disbursement amounted to seven-tenths of 1 per cent. And therefore we have reason to believe that the expectations formed as to the making of these disbursements to pensioners, that they will be conducted with equal precision, with equal economy, and with equal safety from loss to the public, will be realized.

I beg to call the attention of the committee to one more point. It has been, I understand, from time to time an idea brought forward in this House or in Congress that the payments to pensioners could be made from Washington by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the same manner that payments are made of interest on bonds. I have found that those gentlemen who are most careful of the interests of the pensioners are apprehensive that that would be too sudden and too great a change. But in conversation with the Paymaster-General I find he is of opinion that instead of needing eighteen paymasters he probably would be able to reduce the number to four or five, who have their clerks already paid. For these reasons I trust the amendment will meet with favorable consideration in the committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will my friend from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would this lead to an increase in the number of paymasters?

Mr. ROSECRANS. It does not at all increase the number of paymasters.

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes remain to be used in favor of the amendment. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

Mr. MATSON. What I wish to say will not perhaps occupy more than two minutes. The pending proposition provides in substance that supernumerary paymasters of the Army shall be detailed to fill these offices of pension agents. I was disposed to favor that proposition because I thought it was clearly shown that the salaries of pension agents could be saved in that way to the people, and for that reason only.

But I understand the Committee on Appropriations, since this matter was discussed on Thursday last, has concluded a change ought not to be made. I think I am entitled to the belief that that conclusion has been reached upon some sort of agreement and understanding that the number of paymasters shall be reduced. If, therefore, those who favor this proposition can accomplish the substance that they propose to accomplish by it, the reduction of unnecessary officers, I think they will be satisfied; and I apprehend it is not worth while to press this matter with the Committee on Appropriations against us upon it. I am in favor of the proposition and have been all the time; but if we are to understand that the supernumeraries, at least a number equal to the number of pension agents, shall be stricken from the roll, then we are satisfied.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] whether the law does not now provide that the number of paymasters shall be reduced to forty?

Mr. MATSON. I can not say positively as to that.

Mr. STEELE. That is the law.

Mr. MATSON. There is no question about the right of Congress to reduce the number.

Mr. STEELE. The number has been reduced by law. The law provides there shall be no new appointments in the Pay Corps until the number in that corps has been reduced to forty.

Mr. MATSON. The number may have been reduced, but there are still supernumeraries.

Mr. STEELE. There are one hundred and seventy-three posts, nineteen armories and arsenals, three recruiting depots, and one engineer depot where payments have to be made. That will give them all the business they will be able to attend to.

Mr. ROSECRANS. How many times a year have they to pay at the posts?

Mr. STEELE. They ought to pay once every month, but as a matter of fact I believe they pay troops only every two months.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The officers every month, the soldiers every two months.

Mr. STEELE. They have to travel over a large extent of territory.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There will be a proposition to reduce the Pay Corps to a still smaller number.

Mr. STEELE. Hence the more reason why the transfer should not be made. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have implicit faith and confidence that the payments will be efficiently and honestly made by the Pay Department should the transfer be made.

Mr. GREENLEAF. I have great respect for the judgment and well-known abilities of the gentleman from California who offers this amendment to the bill now under consideration; and yet, unpleasant as the duty is to me on this account, I am constrained to oppose the amendment. I object not only to the radical change in the present system for the payment of pensions proposed by my distinguished friend from California, but also to the reduction in the number of pension agents of the United States from eighteen to twelve, as contemplated by the bill; and I object because I believe that such reduction, or such change, would be prejudicial to the interests of hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children in the land who are now drawing pensions, or who may hereafter draw them, by greatly increasing the distance between the remaining twelve agencies, adding much to the cost and trouble of communicating between them, or by experimenting with a new and untried system—half civil, half military—when the old system of pension agencies has proved so satisfactory for so many years.

And I find that I am by no means alone or singular in the view I take of this matter. I find also opposed to the contemplated change that large, that most worthy and highly honored fraternity of my fellow-citizens of New York known as the Grand Army of the Republic, numbering over 26,500 honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy of the United States.

I hold in my hand, sir, a printed copy of a series of resolutions unanimously adopted at the late annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic in my own city of Rochester, forwarded to me by the department or State commander, respectfully protesting against any change in the present system for the payment of pensions; and I will ask the Clerk to read them as a portion of my remarks. It will be observed that in the third and last resolution the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of New York are requested to favor the continuance of the present system of pension agencies.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF NEW YORK,
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Rochester, N. Y., January 31, 1884.

DEAR SIR: At the annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic held in this city January 30, 1884, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the State of New York disapproves the proposed action by Congress to change the system of payment of pensions, for the reason that the interest of the Government is wholly safe under the present agency system, while the convenience and necessities of the pensioners are far better served than they could be under a system of payment at or from Washington.

Resolved, That the promptness and reliability of the agency system which have been approved by twenty years' experience, give that system a just preference with pensioners, and that in the apprehension that any change might not operate so well to the advantage of the Government and the pensioners, we discourage any movement in the direction of a change of methods.

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of New York be requested to favor the continuance of the present agency system for the payment of pensions, which is economical, thorough, and safe, and which to Government and people has proved satisfactory in its practical operations.

JOHN A. REYNOLDS,
Department Commander.
J. A. ADLINGTON,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

To Hon. H. S. GREENLEAF.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. GREENLEAF] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GREENLEAF. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The question is this: Do you understand that my amendment proposes to change the present system of paying pensions?

Mr. GREENLEAF. I do, most assuredly.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Then I have the pleasure to tell you and this committee that it does not. It only changes the officers who are to do the work, and has no more effect on the system than would the employment of Mr. A to do the work now performed by Mr. B as a pension agent.

But the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations to reduce the number of pension agents to twelve would to that extent change the present system of paying pensions. So also would that system to which allusion has been made, that the payment should be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. My proposition is not to change the system, but to have officers of the Army detailed to perform the duty now performed by eighteen pension agents.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from California means, then, simply to impose civil duties upon military officers?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Not at all, not in the slightest degree; that is an entire mistake.

Mr. GREENLEAF. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have in these resolutions an expression of the will of at least 26,500 veteran soldiers and sailors upon this subject from a single State—veterans, who are the most deeply interested in this proposed legislation of any class of citizens in the State; and this expression of their will, it is seen, is clearly and unmistakably averse to the contemplated change in pension agencies; and if there be 26,500 veteran soldiers opposed in one State, how many more, in all probability, must there be opposed in all the States, could their full numbers be known?

Many of these men who thus protest, it should be remembered, are disabled soldiers and sailors, whose welfare we have at heart, whose interests we seek to protect. Therefore, believing as I do that the complete revolution in the system for the payment of pensions proposed by the gentleman from California, or the reduction in the number of agencies from eighteen to twelve, as proposed in the bill, would be detrimental to the interests of those whom, above all others, we are seeking to benefit, I should regard myself as recreant to my duty as their unworthy representative on the floor of this House if I did not in their name and in their behalf oppose with both voice and vote these contemplated innovations on the present system of pension agencies.

I shall vote against both propositions. But I do not wish to be understood from anything I have said as reflecting in the least upon the motives or good faith either of the gentleman from California who offers this amendment or the gentleman from Texas who has charge of the bill; on the contrary, I have no reason to doubt that both these gentlemen are as loyal to the interests of the disabled soldier as I am, or as is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] who preceded me on the floor—and this is saying a good deal. We differ only, I am sure, as to the best mode of accomplishing an object devoutly wished by both sides of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GREENLEAF] has expired. There are three minutes of the time left for debate in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will reserve my time for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The time in favor of the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] will yield to me I will occupy the time.

Mr. HANCOCK. With pleasure.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have in my hands a message sent to Congress by President Buchanan, to which I desire to call attention for a moment. It was a message transmitted to Congress on account of this item in the sundry civil appropriation bill:

For the completion of the Washington Aqueduct, $500,000, to be expended under the plans and estimates of Captain Meigs, and under his superintendence.

The President transmitted to Congress a message in which he said that if it was the purpose of Congress to take from him, or in any way interfere with, his power to command the officers of the Army, then such legislation was unconstitutional and void; that he did not believe that Congress had the power to transfer new duties to new officers, to abolish one office and transfer the duties to another. It is a well-reasoned message, and I believe will commend itself to every gentleman who will take the trouble to read it as sound constitutional law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed by order of the House for debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted. The question before the committee is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS], in the nature of a substitute for a portion of the pending paragraph.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 32, noes 62.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move to amend the paragraph in the manner stated in the proposition which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of lines 25 and 26 "$174,400" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000;" at the end of line 33, strike out "twelve agents" and insert "one agent;" and in line 34, after the word "pensions," insert the words "whose office shall be in the city of Washington, and whose salary shall be $5,000 per annum;" so that it will read:

"For pay and allowances of pension agents: For salary, fees for preparing vouchers, rent, fuel, lights, and postage on letters to the Executive Departments and to pensioners, $50,000: Provided, That from and after July 1, 1884, agents for the payment of pensions shall receive only $5 for each one hundred vouchers, or at that rate for a fraction of one hundred, prepared and paid by any agent in excess of 4,000 vouchers per annum: Provided, further, That from and after October 1, 1884, there shall be no more than one agent for the payment of pensions; whose office shall be in the city of Washington, and whose salary shall be $5,000 per annum; and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the pension agents to not exceeding the number aforesaid; and so much of sections 4778 and 4780 as is in conflict with this provision be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. DIBRELL. The object of that amendment is to reduce the number of pension agents to one, and to have the office of that agent in the city of Washington. I think it is just as easy to pay pensioners from Washington as from other places throughout six or eight or a dozen States. For instance, there is a pension agency in my own State, and the pensioners of nine States are paid from that agency. Even the pensioners of Virginia, which State extends up in sight of Washington, are paid from the pension office in Knoxville, Tenn., and the pensioners of the State of Louisiana are also paid from that office.

I can not for the life of me see why they can not all be paid from Washington as well as from these different agencies. I know that every gentleman who has a pension agency in his district will oppose this proposition; but it will save from one hundred to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the amount proposed by this bill, and I think it is right. The Treasury Department pays the interest on the bonded debt four times a year, and why should we not have an agency in this city to pay the pensioners as easily and readily as they are now paid?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the proposition which he has submitted has had practically the consideration of one of the committees of this House and also of the Commissioner of Pensions, who has made it the subject of a letter which will be found on page 33 of Miscellaneous Document No. 43 of the present sesssion. In that letter the Commissioner states at some length some of the serious objections to the change proposed.

These objections are so familiar to members of this House that I deem it unnecessary to state them in detail. I will, however, state that one serious objection lies in the fact that under the law the checks for the payment of pensions are not permitted to be made out until within a few days of the time of payment, the object being that the pension checks shall not be paid except to persons whose disabilities existed up to a date immediately preceding the payment. Owing to that fact any attempt to have these payments made from Washington would necessarily and inevitably involve a delay which would be a serious detriment to the pensioners. The Commissioner of Pensions, in the letter to which I have called attention, says:

There are not far from 315,000 pensioners on the roll at the present time. The vouchers upon which they are paid quarterly are prepared by the pension agents and sent to the post-office addresses of the pensioners before the quarterly payments become due.

Mr. DIBRELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment right here? The report of the Commissioner of Pensions states that by the reduction of pension agencies from fifty-seven to eighteen there has been a saving of 33 per cent. in the expense of making the payments. Does he not?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am now addressing myself to one of the particular reasons against the proposed change from the present mode of payment through pension agencies in different parts of the country to a system of payments from Washington. The Commissioner further says:

The vouchers, as provided by law, must not be executed before the 4th day of March, June, September, and December of each year, on which days the quarterly pensions become due.

The great bulk of the vouchers are executed on the 4th and 5th of the "pay month," and sent by mail to the agent who is to pay the pension.

Taking the whole roll of pensioners, the following will represent the percentage of payments made during the first ten days from and after the day when pensions become due.

After giving a list, which I will not read, he continues:

To accomplish such results requires an intelligent and efficient clerical force as a permanent force, and this augmented by the employment of an average of ten temporary clerks to each agency for an average period of fifteen days during each quarter.

He takes, as a specific case for illustration, the agency in the State of Ohio, and after reciting the figures he goes on:

I deem it the most important point in the consideration of this question to consult the convenience and well-being of the several thousand pensioners, whether they shall receive their pensions expeditiously or be subjected to a delay from a week to three or four. Among the thousands of pensioners the indigent class are numbered by thousands. To them the difference of a day or two is one of suffering, hunger, and want. Take our larger cities, where agencies are located and where the pensioners can appear in person and receive their pension, and what is witnessed? Long before daylight a crowd is gathered at the agency (waiting for the agent to open his office), this constantly increasing as the day advances, requiring the attendance of police, that the rights of one may not be disregarded by others as they wait their turn for payment.

The appearance of these pensioners who so impatiently avail themselves of an early payment shows too plainly the sufferings from not only their wounds or disease, but hunger and want of proper clothing.

Nearly 50,000 pensioners are paid in person at the agencies, where they can receive a check "payable to bearer," and upon which they can without delay or expense receive its proceeds. It is not infrequently the case where checks are issued payable to their order that find themselves obliged to pay a discount; also a fee to some one to identify them.

The hours of labor at the several agencies are governed very largely by the amount of work to be done. On the morning of the day when the payments become due it is customary with many of the agents to commence paying as early as daylight, and their force of clerks is kept busy until 11 and 12 o'clock at night until the rush is over.

I deem it unnecessary to read further from this statement made officially by the Commissioner of Pensions, the responsible officer in charge of this department of the Government. I do desire, however, to say that while I have failed to hear it stated here that there is any demand from any quarter for a change in the well-settled, thoroughly-organized, and efficient system of pension agencies, there are protests from every part of this nation where a Grand Army of the Republic post is established, or wherever there are pensioners to be paid, against any interference with this system, which is doing its work so well.

Mr. DIBRELL. The Commissioner of Pensions, on page 20 of the report, says:

We are paying 25 per cent. more pensions than before the reduction from fifty-seven to eighteen was made; and are doing it at 33 per cent. less cost.

This is one reason why I say we ought to reduce the number of these agents to one. The very statement read by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], that there are now crowds of pensioners rushing to the office for payment at stated periods, is one reason why they should be paid by letter. We can in this way avoid all this crowding. With our present mail facilities all the pensioners can be paid in two or three days, as their payments become due.

I propose to allow for this work as many clerks and as much money as may be necessary to have pensions paid promptly. I do not wish that there shall be a single day's delay that can possibly be avoided, but I do wish to save the $150,000 or $200,000 a year now unnecessarily paid to pension agents. Before the reduction was made in the number of these agencies we had four of them in Tennessee. Now we have but one, and that agency makes payments for nine States. There is no reason why the pensioners can not be paid from Washington just as well as by these few pension agents in widely separated portions of the country.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him by referring to the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions that, "if pensions should be paid from the Treasury (quarterly as now), and by a force organized for that purpose, the average period which a pensioner would have to wait before payment would be forty-five days."

Mr. DIBRELL. I admit that every pension agent in the country has had petitions gotten up by posts of the Grand Army of the Republic and everybody else whose signatures could be obtained against this proposition. But that does not make it right to continue the present system. As the Commissioner himself states, there was a reduction of 33 per cent. in the expense by reducing the agencies from fifty-seven to eighteen. If these agencies be now reduced to one we can make a further saving of $150,000 to $200,000 a year.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] to the fact that since the reduction of the number of agencies the saving is not so much in the decrease in the number of agencies as in the reduction of the fees for vouchers from 30 cents to 15 cents each, and the proposition has already been adopted by the House to make a further reduction of this fee to 10 cents on each voucher.

Mr. DIBRELL. That will give them about $120,000 a year as fees.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DIBRELL, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 22, noes 65.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to amend by striking out the proviso at the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the portion proposed to be struck out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That from and after July 1, 1884, there shall be no more than twelve agents for the payment of pensions; and it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to reduce the pension agents to not exceeding the number aforesaid; and so much of sections 4778 and 4780 as is in conflict with this provision be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment we have reduced the pension agencies to the lowest possible number consistent with the speedy and I might say the economical administration of this branch of the service. As has already been stated upon the floor, this work must all be done within a few days every quarter; and in order to do it promptly it is necessary for each pension agent to organize a force for the purpose of preparing the vouchers. This is now a temporary force. But if you reduce the number of agencies below eighteen the result in my judgment will be to build up in time a permanent force for the doing of this work. All that is claimed in favor of the proposition embraced in this bill is that it will save the salaries now paid to six of these agents. It will not reduce the sum which is to be paid upon vouchers; it will not reduce any of the other expenses. These officers have been located in different parts of the country with reference to the convenient payment of pensioners. Many of the offices are in public buildings, where there is no rent to be paid. It seems to me well enough to allow the law to stand as it now is.

One word further. We are constantly passing in this House bills to put upon the retired-list officers who rendered meritorious service for the Union during the war of the rebellion. Upon the passage of bills of that kind there is scarcely a division; they go through promptly. Now, I have been furnished with a list of the men holding these positions. Of the eighteen pension agents, sixteen, as I understand, were officers of high merit during the late war, and a large number of them suffered severe wounds. They are crippled for life, and I doubt not if they were to come to this House a bill would be passed to put them on the retired-list.

I say to gentlemen of this committee it would make their hearts bleed to go to the Pension Office and read there the letters recommending these men for this position, giving the history of the wounds they have received and from which they are still suffering. One of the agents is the daughter of a soldier, and the effect of this provision may be to retire her from the service. I believe her father held the place previous to her taking it. Now she may be retired.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that legislation putting out these old men, these old veterans, who have taken these offices on the recommendation of their companions in arms, that legislation to put out that class of men had better be abandoned entirely. They are absolutely pensioners; they are entitled to pensions from the Government. One of them lives in my town. He suffered the amputation of one of his arms up to the shoulder-joint; he is an invalid for life, and incapable of doing manual labor. He and one other are the only ones, I believe, who have survived that operation. I am told by a gentleman who sits at my right that the agent at Milwaukee belongs to that same class.

These wounded soldiers are entitled to pensions from the Government, and the Grand Army of the Republic has come here and asked this system of payment shall not in any way be interfered with. And they had supposed when they did that they had saved their old companions in arms. They did not believe any attempt would be made to reduce the number.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask gentlemen to let these men, thus recommended as they have been by their companions in arms in almost every instance, I beg you most earnestly to let them alone and allow the law to remain as it stands to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, this matter was fully considered in the committee. There were various propositions and a good deal of argument pro and con as to each.

One was that the entire payment should be made from the city of Washington. That was the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL], and I may say it had the strong advocacy of the Treasurer of the United States. I at first favored it, but was outvoted in committee. I believe I may say that so far as my own action is concerned.

The other proposition considered in committee was that of the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS]. It was then thought that the number could be reduced, and I find here, in the testimony given by Mr. Dudley himself, that he stated that while he does not recommend any reduction, he thinks the agency at Augusta, Me., and the one at Concord, N. H., might possibly be consolidated.

The proposition was to reduce to nine, or one-half. It was finally settled, and I thought with general concurrence, although perhaps there were some who disagreed, that the number should be twelve. We were strengthened in that position because we saw no necessity for agencies at Columbus, Louisville, Pittsburgh, and Knoxville. Fixing on some one point would obviate the necessity for the other three of them.

Again, as I have already said, the agencies at Augusta and Concord should be consolidated.

I can see why the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] feels some interest in the matter. We see no necessity for an agency at Syracuse and one at New York city. We did not want to touch the system in any particular. We had no desire to embarrass the prompt payment of pensions to pensioners. On the contrary, we state we can safely reduce the number to twelve and, by decreasing the number of officials, save to the Treasury $24,000 per annum.

There has never been any petition against this. There was never any occasion for any petition on this subject whatever from members of the Grand Army of the Republic, for there was no one on either side or any proposition from any source that meant to embarrass the prompt payment of pensioners. But I know how sensitive these men are and how easily they are worked upon by the men who pay them, and without meaning any disrespect I will say the petitions which have been gotten up were at the instance of these pay agents themselves.

We have now come to a period when we can, without detriment to the pensioners themselves and with manifest economy in the public expenditures, reduce these agencies; and I do not believe that there would be a protest from any source where the manner in which the payments are made is intelligently understood.

I would not like to say that the Commissioner of Pensions favors the reduction proposed, nor, on the other hand, would I like to say that he has put any vehement protest before the committee against some consolidation. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not prevail, but that the committee will be sustained in its effort to make this change, which has been carefully considered by the committee, and which can produce no embarrassment or friction in any direction whatever.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last word.

I do not know that I clearly understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania in saying that the result of this bill might be to abolish the pension agency at Syracuse or that it was contemplated. What was the remark of the gentleman?

Mr. RANDALL. I stated simply the effect of this consolidation; and my inference was a very correct one, that it would possibly abolish the agency either at New York or Syracuse. In such a struggle I suppose Syracuse would have to go under.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that Syracuse would be in any great danger even if there was a consolidation as proposed in this bill, because I believe that many smaller tracts than the great Empire State and with far fewer soldiers to be paid would probably have two agents.

But, sir, I shall not blush for advocating this amendment, even if I am liable to be charged with selfishness in doing so.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not charge anything of that kind.

Mr. HISCOCK. Well, that I am interested in the matter; for I believe that when this class is made up as it is, when this pension agent at Syracuse is, as I have described him to be, a man who in the service of his country was mutilated for life, who is unable to engage in the active pursuits of life—I say when such a case as that is presented, it is my duty as well as my pleasure to raise my voice in protest against any legislation that will strike at him or at the class that he represents. If these people were civilians, if they were capable of supporting and taking care of themselves, as they are not in many instances, you might say then, "Reduce them," and there would probably be little protest. But I do not put it too strong when I state that they are absolute pensioners upon the Government and dependent upon that employment for their support. This law is itself substantially a pension-roll for the benefit of the wounded and disabled soldiers, or, if it is not, it ought to be.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that I hope all such as he describes will be retained. But there are many pension agents who have never been in the Army, so far as I know.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not know of that. But take the case of the agent at Chicago. There, as I have shown, the agent is the daughter of a soldier. Now, some one has said that Chicago would retain her office. That may be true; but retaining the office at Chicago is not of necessity retaining this lady as the officer in charge of it. It is to be a consolidation of offices, and when consolidated, when the number is reduced, they will be assigned to different points for accommodation in making payments to the pensioners.

Now, this list is made up of a character of men that we can not afford to interfere with; and I say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that when he reduces them to twelve he invades that list of wounded men and pensioners. I do not know who they are in the State of Pennsylvania, and I care not. In that State one of them, I believe, at least, if not more, was not in active service. I think one was a soldier, but not engaged in a department of the service perhaps which would entitle him to consideration of this kind. But you can make the reduction without striking at men that no member of this committee, in my judgment, would desire to interfere with.

I now ask, in conclusion, the attention of the committee while I read what the Commissioner of Pensions has said upon the subject:

> In the matter of the reduction of the number of pension agencies I may simply state that I would not be justified in placing myself on record in favor of such change. One of the first considerations proper, it seems to me, is the convenience of the pensioners, when the same is compatible with good public policy. Therefore I do not think the change proposed is a wise one.

Now, it is true that by this reduction $24,000 can be saved. But it is a small amount in comparison with the injury that it may do. The President has already the right to reduce where it is necessary the number——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DEUSTER was recognized.

Mr. RANDALL. We leave it entirely with the President.

Mr. HISCOCK. If I may be permitted to answer that suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will permit me I simply wish to say that the consolidation proposed by this bill is left entirely in the hands of the President, as all other consolidations have been of these officers heretofore.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand that the provision of this bill is mandatory on the President.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly; of course he would hardly decrease his patronage.

Mr. DEUSTER. The reduction of pension agencies from the present number (eighteen) to twelve is a matter that concerns many of my constituents. I believe that a further reduction of these agencies would not be either for the benefit of the Government or pensioners, particularly in the West, where the great extent of territory renders the matter of distance from the place of payment an important item in the time within which payments can be received by pensioners. It may be true that the present agents pay all pensions more rapidly than the former agents to the number of fifty-four, but this is due to new methods, by which a larger number are paid each day; but there is a point beyond which the number of such daily payments can not be made with safety to the Government or the agents. To make a reduction, therefore, of $24,000 at the cost of delay in payments to a large number of needy pensioners, and at the cost of the loss to the Government of the personal supervision of payments by agents, would be poor economy, when it is remembered that these agents are expected to disburse $80,000,000 of the Government funds. That these disbursements are now made rapidly and with less expense to the Government than any other disbursements of the Government will be evident from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and that any considerable amount in the cost of such disbursements can be saved to the Government without loss in promptness of payment is hardly possible. Therefore I shall feel bound to support the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to strike out the last proviso of the section.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 25, noes 73.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the second section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 1 of the act entitled "An act relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases," approved the 20th day of June, A. D. 1878, be, and the same is hereby, made applicable to bounty, arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, and bounty-land cases, and pension cases in which arrears of pension are or shall be claimed or granted. And the fee of $10 prescribed by law shall not be payable to nor demanded or received by any agent or attorney in any pension case, whether for arrears or otherwise, or in any bounty, arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, or bounty-land case, in whole or in part, until such claim shall be allowed. Upon allowance of arrears of pension and pension cases the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct that the same be paid by the proper pension agent in the manner provided for in sections 4768 and 4769 of the Revised Statutes. And the provisions of section 5485 of the Revised Statutes shall be applicable to any person who shall violate this act.

This act shall apply to pending as well as all future applications for allowance of arrears-of-pay, lost-horse, arrears-of pension, and pension cases: Provided, That where the pensioner obtaining a pension, or an increase thereof on a pending application, has heretofore paid to his agent or attorney a sum equal to the whole or any part of the fee by this act allowed, said pensioner shall be entitled to credit for the same against the sum which would otherwise be payable as aforesaid to such agent or attorney.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I move to strike out section 2 of the bill and substitute in its stead what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person shall demand or receive any fee for his services in pension, arrears-of-pension, or bounty-land claims until the allowance of the claim.

SEC. 3. That all fees in pension claims shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions out of the first installment of pension due the claimant, and no agent, attorney, or other person shall receive any fee for his services in a pension claim except through the agent for paying pensions.

SEC. 4. That the fee in all pension, arrears-of-pension, or bounty-land claims shall be $10, except in cases of special written contract, filed in the Pension Office and approved by the Commissioner of Pensions, as hereinafter provided. The claimant may contract with his attorney of record, in writing, in such form as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe, for a fee to an amount not exceeding $25, except in claims for increase of pension where no new disability is alleged, in cases of pensions for service, and in all claims filed in the Pension Office after June 28, 1878, and prior to the passage of this act, in which cases no fee above $10 shall be contracted for; and in all claims filed prior to the passage of this act the attorney shall file a statement, under oath, duly attested, setting forth the amount of fee already received by him, and the amount already received shall be deducted from the fee allowed by this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before his Department, and may require of such persons, agents, and attorneys, before being recognized as representatives of claimants that they shall show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to enable them to render such claimants valuable service and otherwise competent to advise and assist such claimants in the presentation of their cases; and such Secretary may suspend, debar, dismiss, and disbar from further practice before his Department any such person, agent, or attorney shown to be incompetent, disreputable, or who refuses to abide by the said rules and regulations, or who shall in any manner deceive, mislead, or threaten any claimant or presumptive claimant by word, circular, letter, or by advertisement.

SEC. 6. That any agent or attorney, or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension, or arrears thereof, who shall directly or indirectly contract for, demand, or receive, and retain, any compensation for his services or instrumentality for prosecuting a claim for pension, or arrears thereof, greater than is herein provided, or in any other manner than herein provided, or shall willfully or knowingly make a false statement in regard to the amount of fee already received, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $1,000, or be confined at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be forever afterward debarred from practicing before the Pension Office.

Mr. HANCOCK. I desire to make a statement in reference to this proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is entitled to the floor for five minutes on his amendment.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I understand the gentleman from Texas having this bill in charge on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations accepts this amendment. Am I correct?

Mr. HANCOCK. I have no right to accept the amendment, but I want to state to the committee that this amendment as first presented and printed in the RECORD has been considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and they have directed me to say it was acceptable to them; and if agreeable to the Committee of the Whole, they are willing it should be adopted in lieu of the second section of the pending bill, and I have no doubt it will be if they have a chance to vote on it.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. With the understanding which has been stated by the gentleman from Texas, I have no disposition to make any remark. I will simply make this suggestion in addition to what has been said by the gentleman having this bill in charge, that this amendment was thoroughly and carefully matured by the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and I was instructed to offer it as a substitute for this second section. With that remark I have nothing further to say, unless some gentleman of the committee desires some explanation.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether this amendment in any way affects any existing contracts so as to allow a claim agent to charge those for whom he may have already filed claims a larger fee?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I answer that question in the negative. It was the intention of the committee that the amendment should not allow contracts already made to be increased, or new contracts to be made in lieu thereof, and that the bill should not be retroactive in any respect.

Mr. HART. I do not desire to oppose the amendment; but I would say that it is a matter of such important legislation that I think we ought to read it carefully and understand what we are doing. It seems to me the committee had better rise, that we may have a chance of examining it. Otherwise, I propose to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late in making the point of order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. There was considerable confusion while the amendment, which is somewhat lengthy, was being read. I will ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] to explain in a few words the difference between his substitute and the second section of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. In response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], I will endeavor to explain as nearly as I can the difference between the substitute which we offer and the section as reported in the pending bill. Before doing so, however, I will state that in order that the members of the committee might have ample opportunity to examine and criticise the proposed substitute, and to offer objections to it if there were found to be any objections which were tenable, I asked and received permission of the House to have it printed in the RECORD, and it will be found in the RECORD of April 17, 1884. It is due, however, that I should say that since that time some slight alterations from the printed text have been made.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Not only recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions but recommended by the committee after due consideration and explanation by him in the presence of the committee. Those changes, however, are not important. The chief difference will be found in section 4 as printed in the RECORD, but section 5 as read by the Clerk. Section 4 of the substitute as originally proposed conferred a general power upon the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe regulations for the admission of parties to practice before the Pension Bureau and to govern himself as a sound policy might dictate upon that particular subject. The substitute as now proposed prescribes the exact powers which the Secretary of the Interior may exercise in that regard. The only difference, therefore, between the two provisions is that the one is specific, while the other is general; the one gave a general power over the whole subject to the Secretary of the Interior, the other points out specifically what he shall require of parties practicing before the Pension Bureau as regards their efficiency, moral character, &c.

There are some other suggestions which I want to make in response to the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], which is a very proper one. In the second section, as reported in the bill from the Committee on Appropriations, there is a provision in relation to lost-horse claims. The committee offering this substitute thought that provision was unimportant and unnecessary. As I said on a former occasion, no one can now put in a claim for lost horses except officers of the Army, and we thought they were capable of attending to their own interests.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is mistaken; claims for lost horses can be presented by privates.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I have been informed differently.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Privates of cavalry regiments can present such claims. I know from my own knowledge that many of them furnished their own horses.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Accept that then to be true, and that I have been wrongly informed; still the time has expired in which claims of that character can be filed at all. Why then extend the provisions of this act to them when it can have no sort of effect on that class of claims? We therefore propose to leave them where the law heretofore has left them.

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes allowed by the rule for debate in support of the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the amendment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do so far as——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that by order of the House a recess must be taken at 5 o'clock; and therefore unless debate is made brief the bill can not be finished before that time.

Mr. STORM. I will ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] be extended. He has been called upon for an explanation, and we desire to hear it fully.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] asks that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to use only about a minute, and I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas.

I introduced the original provision which appears in the bill now before the House. My object was to protect claimants against the Government from the sharps hanging about this city who endeavor to entrap them into contracts for large fees.

I wish, however, to call attention more particularly to one point the gentleman has alluded to. He seems to be under the impression that there are no claims for lost horses except those presented by officers. In that he is mistaken. There were cavalry regiments whose privates furnished their own horses, and there are many such claims now before the Department unadjusted and undisposed of. I want to protect that class of claimants, for the reason that I have constituents who have been entrapped into making contracts to pay to claim agents here one-third, and in some cases one-half, of the amount which may be recovered for their lost horses.

I am not desirous of opposing the amendment which has been offered except for the purpose of drawing attention to this fact, and also to state that hereafter when the opportunity shall present itself I shall insist upon some action being taken which will protect other claimants against the Government besides pension claimants from the same troubles and difficulties which arise in their cases.

Mr. MATSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that the gentleman from Kentucky, Colonel WOLFORD, commanded a regiment which furnished its own horses.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And every gentleman here from the North knows that there were a number of regiments where the privates furnished their own horses.

My object in introducing the original provision in the bill was to protect applicants for pensions. I first limited the amount of the fee to $10. I am, however, willing on that point to yield to the views of others and will not oppose an amendment to raise the amount which may be allowed.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. If my friend from Illinois will examine the matter he will find that the time within which claims for lost horses could be preferred expired January 9, 1884.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But hundreds of such claims, filed before that date, are now pending.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The response to that is this: The committee presume that in all those cases the parties had already made contracts; and we thought it unwise and unconservative legislation to undertake to interfere with contracts already made under existing law. Therefore the committee left out of consideration the question as to that class of claims.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to inquire whether this has the approval of the Department?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. It has.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Every word of it.

Mr. HOUK. What does the substitute provide as to the limitation of the fee?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The limitation is $25; and that amount is not to be allowed except in a certain class of cases—difficult cases.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And the provision is not retroactive.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The present law, I understand, limits the fee to $10.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Yes, sir. This provision allows a fee of $25 in a difficult class of cases.

Mr. RANDALL. Subject to the discretion of the Commissioner.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The provision is not retroactive; and the Commissioner has approved every word of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. The Commissioner has prepared and we have adopted as our report an epitome in regard to this whole subject of legislation. I really think this document is valuable enough to be preserved, and if I can have unanimous consent I would like to have it printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be printed as a part of the gentleman's remarks, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

The document is as follows:

[Report to accompany bill H. R. 3882.]

The Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3882) amending the pension laws relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension and bounty-land cases, have had the same under consideration, and, with some slight amendments, recommend its passage in lieu for all others on that subject.

The subject being one of such vital interest to the claimants for pension, as well as securing uniformity in practice and providing the means which will enable the Pension Office to be divested of much useless labor now entailed upon it by the existing law relating to attorneys, your committee deem it proper to give something of the history of legislation on this subject and the effects thereof, believing the same in itself is a good and sufficient reason for new legislation.

The periods covered by legislation on this subject may be divided into three:

The first from 1862 to 1870, and governed by the acts of July 14, 1862 (sections 6 and 7), and that of July 4, 1864 (section 12). The first act provided that an agent or attorney in a pension or bounty-land claim should receive as his compensation a fee not to exceed the sum of $5 for making out and filing a declaration, and an additional sum of $1.50 for each affidavit required and filed as additional testimony, except the affidavit of surgeons.

The second-named act (1864) repealed the former, and provided that such agent or attorney should be entitled to a fee not to exceed the sum of $10, the same to be in full compensation for all services rendered in obtaining such pension, and that such fee should not be demanded or received, in whole or in part, until the pension was obtained.

The second period was from 1870 to 1878, governed by the act of July 8, 1870 (section 7), wherein it was provided that the fee of agents and attorneys, for the preparation and prosecution of claims for pension and bounty land, should not exceed the sum of $25. Such agent or attorney was required to file with the Commissioner of Pensions for his approval duplicate articles of agreement, without cost to the claimant, setting forth the amount of fee agreed upon. Also that in such cases where no fee-agreement was filed, the fee should not exceed $10. It was further provided that the fee in any case should not be paid, except upon the allowance of the same, and then to be paid by the pension agent out of the first payment of the pension.

The violation of the provisions of either of the acts before mentioned so far as they related to attorneys and their fees was made a misdemeanor.

The third period was from 1878 to the present time, and governed by the act of June 20, 1878. This act is quoted in full, as follows:

"An act relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, It shall be unlawful for any attorney, agent, or other person to demand or receive for his services in a pension case a greater sum than $10. No fee-contract shall hereafter be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions in any case. In pending cases in which a fee-contract has heretofore been filed, if the pension shall be allowed, the Commissioner of Pensions shall approve the same as to the amount of the fee to be paid at the amount specified in the contract. Sections 4768, 4769, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to any case or claim hereafter filed, nor to any pending claim, in which the claimant has not been represented by an agent or attorney prior to the passage of this act.

Prior to 1862 there was no statutory provision relating to agents or attorneys and their fees. They were at liberty to make such contracts as they pleased, and not infrequently received a greater portion of the pension for such services as they rendered.

The initiatory steps taken by the act of July 14, 1862, soon demonstrated by its practical workings that the question of the fee should be more clearly defined in order to give any sort of protection to the claimant. It so loosely guarded the claimant's interest that an unscrupulous attorney could for unnecessary or even pretended services increase his compensation, and against such a procedure there was no adequate remedy.

The limit of the fee to $10 as provided by the act of July 4, 1864, was the first step taken which offered any guarantee for the protection of the claimant against extortion. The limit of fee to $10 was a fair compensation at that time, indeed, more liberal than would be a twenty-five-dollar fee at present. The class of invalid cases then filed were almost wholly on account of gunshot wounds, and it was the exception to the rule when any evidence was required which was not contained in the declaration. In other words, the great bulk of the claims then filed were established upon the record.

It was during this period that the work of the Pension Office assumed such proportion that afforded opportunities for experience. The magnitude of its work had then fairly commenced. It was during this and the former period, that is, prior to 1870, that upon the allowance of a pension the certificate granting the same was transmitted direct to the attorney in the case. It was the rule with the attorney during this time to take from his client a general power of attorney, which not only authorized him to prosecute his claim, but to receive his pension certificate, execute the vouchers for the pension, and receive, as such attorney, the amount of pension due. The most favorable means, it will be seen, was provided under the law to assist a dishonest agent to swindle his client. The abuses of this character were many, and often the pensioner was in ignorance of the amount which had been allowed him, as the same would be appropriated by his attorney. This was regarded as the one great weak point in the then existing law, and from the experience afforded came the act of July 8, 1870.

This act increased the amount of fee from ten to a maximum of twenty-five dollars, payable only in such cases where a contract was filed which should stipulate the amount of fee in case it was to exceed $10.

The claimant in such case was permitted to exercise a judgment of his own. As before stated, the fee under this act was contingent upon the allowance of the claim, and it was unlawful to demand or receive any fee, or part thereof, not only if the claim was not prosecuted to a successful issue, but the same could not be received by the attorney except from the pension agent out of the first payment of the pension.

The general feature of this law secured the interest of the claimant, protected that of his attorney, and guaranteed the payment of the fee whenever he fulfilled the terms of his contract; served as a check upon filing unmeritorious claims, as an attorney generally would fail to file and prosecute the same unless there was a reasonable chance of success, for otherwise he would receive no fee. It is true that abuses existed while this law was in operation, as they will always exist under any statute. There would be technical violation of the same in some instances; in others, by evasive acts and means employed by the unscrupulous, whereby they might succeed in their dishonest ends in such manner that it would often be impossible to sustain a criminal action against them.

The act of June 20, 1878, reversed the order of things entirely. It reduced the fee or rather limited the same to $10. It left the attorney and the claimant to adjust the payment, the amount only being limited by law. In its operations it failed even to protect the claimant as to the amount of fee, only to the extent that any one attorney could not receive a greater sum than $10, while others might succeed one after another to the attorneyship and "bleed" the claimant.

We feel justified in quoting from the report of Commissioner Dudley at length upon the necessities of a statutory substitute to the existing law. On pages 16 and 17, report for the year June 30, 1883, the Commissioner says:

"I can perhaps add nothing new to what I have already said in my reports of 1881 and 1882 upon this subject further than to say that the evils complained of have greatly increased and will continue, and that the present situation calls for immediate action on the part of Congress. The questions affecting the relations of claimants and claim agents and their status before this office as practitioners are, all things considered, the most perplexing and annoying which arise in the administration of the Pension Bureau.

"The construction which has heretofore been placed upon the act of June 20, 1878, by which agents claim and exact generally their fee in advance, has, I think, operated to practically exclude from the practice many educated, responsible, and useful attorneys, and has attracted to it many ignorant, unscrupulous, and useless persons, whose only object seems to be, first, to procure applications from soldiers, regardless of merit, to be filed through them, and then, while acting simply as transmitters of the papers, assiduously dun the claimant until the ten-dollar fee is secured, and thereafter practically abandon the case, like a 'squeezed orange,' preferring rather to seek new victims than expend time in serving old ones. Rules must be framed and practice adhered to which will protect as far as possible the unwary claimant in his dealings with this class of men. As it is impossible to discriminate, respectable, industrious, and useful agents, who are honestly endeavoring to forward the interests of their principals, justly complain of the severity and rigor with which we are compelled to enforce our rules of practice.

"I quote from my report of 1881, as follows: 'In my opinion the actual results of the enactment of June 20, 1878, have been deleterious to the interests of the claimants and agents alike; to claimants, in that the abolishment of the contingency of success and the removal of the security to the agents has stimulated many irresponsible persons, who could be of no possible service to the claimants, to invite a general application of soldiers for pension, regardless of disabilities incurred, by which, after filing the claim, they may obtain in advance the legal fee of $10 and thenceforth abandon the claim, thus encumbering the files of the office and hindering and delaying meritorious claimants; to the agents, by degrading the profession and bringing into disrepute an otherwise legitimate employment. Agents in good standing and well informed in pension law and practice, when their fee depended upon the successful prosecution of the claim, would, and I believe did, examine and scrutinize the merits before risking years of labor, and refuse to file cases without merit. Unpleasant friction between the principal and agent was avoided by the contingent fee and security of payment, because of the identity of interests.'

"I recommend that Congress re-enact the laws in force prior to June 20, 1878, upon this subject, and make such provision as will protect the Department and claimant alike from ignorant and useless agents, and protect and assist well-informed and useful ones."

And from the report of 1882, as follows:

"In my last annual report I dwelt upon the subject of claim agents and attorneys and their fees. Experience fully justifies me in my opinion in all that was said in that report touching this subject, and I wish to refer to it and make it a part of this. Much time and labor are spent in the prosecution of claims by attorneys and agents, who, after years of labor, find themselves limited to a fee of $10, and in self-interest resort to subterfuges and devious methods to obtain a greater fee from the claimant. I think this office should be relieved from the vast amount of annoyance caused by the petty prosecution of men, perhaps not otherwise dishonest, who find the opportunity offered by the receipt of large sums of arrears of pension by their principals to collect from them a greater fee than is allowed by the act of June 20, 1878, too great a temptation to be borne.

"Wherever such cases come to my knowledge it is my duty, and I have endeavored to discharge it by prosecuting the offender and recommending that he be disbarred from practice. The offense is often so trifling that it is exceedingly annoying to be compelled to set so much force upon such small and seemingly unimportant outside matters. In my opinion the remedy lies, as I have before recommended, in the substantial re-enactment of the law in force at the time said act of June 20, 1878, was passed, the salient points to be covered being, first, the establishment of a reasonable fee for the claim agent or attorney; second, the agreement therefor to be by written contract, which, as to the amount of the fee, shall be subject to the approval and discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions, and the form to be prescribed by him; third, the payment of such fee to be contingent upon the successful prosecution of the claim; fourth, the payment thereof to be made by the pension agent, such guarded provisions to be enacted as will prevent injustice being done claimants whose claims are already on file, where payment of some part of the fee has been made in advance, so that the claimant shall have the full benefit of such payment. I can not but believe that a well-guarded law of this character will attract to the pension practice an honorable and upright class of regular attorneys who can not now afford to undertake the business for the fee, and who are unwilling to be annoyed by such employment under the restrictions as they exist under the present law.

"In this connection I would recommend that section 5485, prescribing a penalty for the reception or retention of an illegal fee, be amended as follows: Strike out the words following 'than is provided,' in line 5 in said section, the words in the title 'pertaining to pension,' and insert in lieu thereof the words 'by law.'".

Commissioner Dudley informs the committee that the construction which has been given the act of June 20, 1878, did not prohibit agents and attorneys from receiving from claimant the fee stipulated by that act in advance, either in whole or in part. In other words, the agent was permitted to collect his fee without securing to his client any guarantee that he would prosecute the claim to a final determination.

The Commissioner further informs us that immediately after the passage of the act of 1878 his predecessor commended its provisions, believing that the incentive on the part of attorneys to "draw up" claims was checked, and that the falling off in the numbers filed gave promise that those which were filed would prove to contain a larger percentage of meritorious claims; that the attorney being left entirely with his client in the matter of fee, would be less likely to file a claim without merit, it being presumed that a claimant who would file a claim deficient in merit would not pay a fee to his attorney unless he secured a pension.

These presumptions the Commissioner informs us were more apparent than real, and subsequent experience has fairly demonstrated them to be erroneous. He says that for the six months immediately following the act of June 20, 1878, there was a falling off of upward of 25 per cent. in the number of claims filed. As the numbers filed increased during the pendency of the bill in Congress, and the change was so radical, aftertime has shown the suspension was but temporary. The period following the six months quoted and up to July 1, 1880, was that covered by the arrears act of 1879. Since that time, however, that is, since the limitation imposed by the arrears act, the number of claims filed (excluding 1812 and increase claims) have increased at an annual average of 110 per cent. compared with the six months referred to, and an annual average increase of 63 per cent. compared with the average of the years 1877 and 1878.

The abuses practiced, which the present fee-law fails to prohibit or prevent, so clearly pointed out by the Commissioner in his annual report, by no means show the extent to which they are carried. He says that by a construction put upon that act by his predecessor, an attorney may file a claim for pension, and before taking any further action demand and receive his fee of $10, either in whole or part, in advance, and if paid in part only, abandon the claim because of failure to secure his whole fee at the start, leaving the case to be operated upon in like manner by another attorney, or the attorney may file the declaration knowing from the facts stated that the claim is without merit or without title under the law, and concealing this from his client, who may be in ignorance of the fact, exact a fee from him; or the claim may be rejected by the Pension Office, upon facts shown by a medical examination, and the action taken withheld from the claimant by his attorney until the fee in full is paid. In this latter case, if the full fee of $10 has been paid and the claimant believes he can succeed in satisfying the Pension Office that he is entitled to a pension, he usually finds himself obliged to secure the services of another attorney and pay another fee, as the first attorney, having already received $10, the maximum amount, finds it no longer to his interest to perform any more labor in that case.

Cases are numerous where the evidence is apparent that it is the intention of the attorney to do no more than to file the claim, secure as much of the fee as he can, and then abandon it.

Attorneys and agents do business under names and firm styles which evidently are taken for the purpose of evading criminal liability in case of detection of fraud, partners often having no existence save on paper. In other cases an attorney will practice under a name or firm style. One or more of his or their clerks or some member of their family will also appear as constituting another claim agency. The first of either who secures a client will obtain the fee. If the case is rejected one of the other named will at once secure the attorneyship in the case, informing the claimant of their ability, in their belief, to secure favorable action. Then a second fee is secured.

There seem to be several of these "chains of attorneys" having but one head and proprietorship, and by such cunning devices are enabled to "bleed" the claimant, and at the same time, if detected in violation of law and suspended from practice, secure to one of their "branches" the attorneyship in the claims on their (?) files, and thereby operate to again receive the full fee without regard to what may have been paid in the former instance.

This class of claim agents will oppose the reforms proposed by the bill herewith submitted, but it is confidently stated that the reputable and valuable class of claim agents, who faithfully represent their clients, and should be excepted from the above strictures, will heartily welcome the reforms hereby proposed.

The present limit of fee to $10 practically excludes the local attorneys and throws the business into the hands of those who conduct large claim bureaus.

In small communities where the claimant can meet his attorney and explain to him circumstances whereby he can proceed intelligently to obtain the necessary testimony in his case, and where also the witnesses or many of them may reside, the difficulties are much lessened in proving his case. But with a fee limited to $10 the country practitioner finds it unprofitable to devote his time to such services and impossible to either devote the time required for the fee or compete with the larger firms located here, who can render him much less valuable services. It should be remembered in this connection that the great proportion of claims require considerable testimony.

From the Commissioner's report it is shown that among the pending claims 92 per cent. are on account of disease and combined disabilities, the remaining 8 per cent. only being gunshot wounds.

In the dependent class even more testimony is necessarily required.

In the substitute for the present law the general features contained in the acts of July 4, 1864, and July 8, 1870, have been combined, preserving the former and limiting the latter to certain classes of cases. The other changes are such as are necessary to adapt them to subsequent changes in the law, as well as curing such defects as have from time to time been brought to the attention of the Pension Office.

We append hereto correspondence forwarded to this committee by the Secretary of the Interior pertinent to this subject:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, March 11, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a communication, dated December 19, 1883, from the Commissioner of Pensions, based upon complaints which have reached his office relative to the practice of attorneys for claimants for pension of demanding the payment of fees in advance of the allowance of the pension, and suggesting that a rule be established by this Department prohibiting the demand of such advance fees.

The Commissioner deems the matter of much importance in the interests of claimants and of the Government, and as there may be doubt whether a proper construction of the act of June 20, 1878, relating to fees in pension cases, would justify the Department in taking the action proposed, I have concluded to submit the subject to your committee for consideration as to the propriety of further legislation.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

Hon. A. J. WARNER,
Chairman Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1883.

SIR: In view of the many complaints made by applicants for pension of the wrongs and injustice they have suffered at the hands of unscrupulous claim agents and attorneys in their dealings with them, and in view of the questionable practices and methods resorted to by such agents and attorneys in obtaining and prosecuting business before this office, to some of which wide publicity has been recently given in the public press, I have the honor to present the subject for your consideration to ascertain whether a rule of practice can not be established to remedy the evils complained of.

But before entering upon the question of remedy it is deemed not inappropriate to give a statement of the various acts and statutory provisions relative to fees of attorneys and claim agents for services rendered by them in the prosecution of such claims, and the following statement is therefore submitted, namely:

Prior to the passage of the act of July 14, 1862, there does not appear to have been any legislation on the subject, and pension applicants were left free to enter into such agreements with attorneys and claim agents, and to pay them such sum for the prosecution of their claims as was mutually agreed upon; and they generally executed and delivered to their attorneys or claim agents powers of attorney authorizing them to receive and receipt for their pension-money when it should become due and payable. From this money when received the attorneys or claim agents would deduct the amount of the fee agreed upon, which was, as a general rule, one-half of the full amount of pension-money received at the first payment.

The first legislative enactment relative to fees in pension cases is the said act of July 14, 1862. The sixth section of that act provides that the fees of agents and attorneys "for making out and causing to be duly executed a declaration by the applicant, with the necessary affidavits, and forwarding the same to the Pension Office with the requisite correspondence," shall not exceed $5, except "in cases wherein additional testimony is required by the Commissioner of Pensions, for each affidavit as required and executed and forwarded (except the affidavits of surgeons, for which such agents and attorneys shall not be entitled to any fee), $1.50."

This section was repealed by the twelfth section of the act of July 4, 1864, which provides "that the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed the papers necessary to establish a claim for a pension, bounty, and other allowances before the Pension Office, under this act, shall not exceed the following rates: For making and causing to be duly executed a declaration by the applicant, with the necessary affidavits, and forwarding the same to the Pension Office with the requisite correspondence, $10; which sum shall be received by such agent or attorney in full for all services in obtaining such pension, and shall not be demanded or received in whole or in part until such pension shall be obtained."

Section 4 of the act of June 6, 1866, provides "that no claim agent or other person shall hereafter charge or receive more than 25 cents for preparing the papers necessary to establish a pensioner to receive a semi-annual payment of his pension."

Section 7 of the act of July 8, 1870, provides that "the fee of agents and attorneys for the preparation and prosecution of a claim for pension or bounty land, under any or all the various acts of Congress granting the same, shall not exceed in any case the sum of $25. It shall be the duty of the agent or attorney of record in the prosecution of the case to cause to be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions, for his approval, duplicate articles of agreement without additional cost to the claimant, setting forth the fee agreed upon between the parties, and which agreement shall be executed in the presence of and certified by some officer competent to administer oaths. In all cases where application is made for pension or bounty land, and no agreement is filed with and approved by the Commissioner as herein provided, the fee shall be $10 and no more."

And section 9 of the same act provides "that the Commissioner of Pensions shall forward the certificate of pension granted in any case to the agent for paying pension where said certificate shall be made payable, and at the same time forward therewith one of the articles of agreement filed in the case and approved by the Commissioner, setting forth the fee agreed upon between the claimant and the attorney or agent, and when no agreement is on file, as hereinbefore provided, he shall direct that a fee of $10 only be paid said agent or attorney." And section 10 of that act makes it "the duty of the agent paying such pension to deduct from the amount due the pensioner the amount of fee so agreed upon, or directed by the Commissioner to be paid where no agreement is filed and approved, and forward or cause to be fowarded to the agent or attorney of record named in said agreement, or, in case there is no agreement, to the agent prosecuting the case, the amount of the proper fee, deducting therefrom the sum of 30 cents in payment of his services in forwarding the same."

Section 31 of the act of March 3, 1873, provides "that no agent or attorney or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension or bounty land shall demand or receive any other compensation for his services in prosecuting a claim for pension or bounty land than such as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct to be paid to him, not exceeding $25," and the balance of the section fixes the penalty for the violation of it and other provisions of the pension laws.

These various acts were in substance revised in sections 4768, 4769, 4785, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes, and the provisions of those sections remained in force until the passage of the act of June 20, 1878. This act provides that "it shall be unlawful for any attorney, agent, or other person to demand or receive for his services in a pension case a greater sum than $10. No fee contract shall be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions in any case. In pending cases in which a fee contract has heretofore been filed, if the pension shall be allowed, the Commissioner of Pensions shall approve the same as to the amount of the fee to be paid at the amount specified in the contract. Sections 4768, 4769, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to any case or claim hereafter filed, nor to any pending claim in which the claimant has not been represented by an agent or attorney prior to the passage of this act."

Although the provision of the twelfth section of the act of June 4, 1864, prohibiting agents and attorneys from demanding or receiving, in whole or in part, any part of the fee until the pension become due and payable, was not continued in subsequent legislation, it was kept up as a rule of practice in this office until after the passage of the act of June 20, 1878. Soon after the passage of that act my immediate predecessor, without, as I am advised, having had any conference or consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, changed that practice; and, although no order was formulated on the occasion, he decided in effect that there was nothing in the pension laws, as they then stood, forbidding claim agents or attorneys from demanding or receiving their fee of $10, allowed by the said act of June 30, 1878, in whole or in part, in advance of the allowance of pension claims filed subsequent to the date of its passage, or in advance of the rendition by them of any services in the prosecution of the same.

The opinion is expressed by Mr. Commissioner Bentley in a letter addressed to the then Secretary of the Interior, dated July 13, 1878. That letter appears to have been written under the following circumstances, to wit: Immediately after the passage of the act of June 20, 1878, a number of claim agents and attorneys doing business in this city called upon Mr. Bentley and verbally requested him to "direct that the pension certificates to be issued in claims filed after the passage of the act relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases approved June 19 (20), 1878, be delivered to the agent or attorney who aided in the prosecution of the claim, to be held as a security for his fee." Mr. Bentley having verbally refused to give such direction, they then addressed a communication, in writing, to Mr. Secretary Schurz, bearing date June 24, 1878, and containing the same request. This communication was referred to Mr. Bentley for an expression of his views on the question involved therein. As, in giving his views on that question, he also sets forth the reasons which led to, and the objects which were expected to be gained by the passage of the act referred to, no apology would seem to be required for quoting almost his entire letter, which I proceed to do.

After alluding to the laws relative to the fees of claim agents and attorneys, as they existed prior to June 20, 1878, and the fact of the passage of the act of that date and the amount of the ten-dollar fee allowed thereby, &c., he proceeds as follows, namely:

"Except upon the point of reducing the maximum fee, the provisions of the act were commended by me to the committees of Congress which had the subject in consideration, and mainly for the following reasons:

"First. The duty of revising the fee contracts was one of great difficulty and could not be performed satisfactorily either to the Commissioner or to the attorney.

"Second. The guarantee of the payment of the agent's fee, contained in the provision that it should be paid him by the agent for paying pensions, when connected with the ex parte system in force for the adjustment of the claims, operated as an encouragement both to claim agents and to claimants to present and prosecute claims for pensions.

"Third. Altogether the provisions in relation to the agent's fee entailed directly upon the bureau much unnecessary labor in executing them, and indirectly by bringing forward a very large number of claims which are without merit.

"I need only to refer to the number of original claims for invalid pension which have been filed within the last four fiscal years (Table I), as compared with the number of cases of the same class filed in the four years immediately preceding, to the constantly increasing number of pending cases in spite of the greatly increased number of cases which have been disposed of during the last two years, and to the fact that notwithstanding the very liberal rules by which the cases are adjudicated, nearly 50 per cent. of the number decided were rejected, to satisfy any considerate observer that there is, to say the very least, too little attention paid by the claim agents to the character of the claims which they procure, file, and prosecute. Another important feature should be mentioned.

"A few claim agents and firms located at Washington and at some other central points represent a large majority of all the claims which are filed by attorneys in the later years. Some of the attorneys publish periodicals under 'catching titles,' in the interest of their occupation, and with others advertise widely their peculiar facilities for the prosecution of pension claims, and it has resulted in bringing into their hands a large majority of the pension claims which are prosecuted by attorneys being entirely unacquainted with the merits of the claims they represent. Whenever fraud is discovered in one of them they are prompt to deny responsibility upon the ground of their personal ignorance of the claimants and of the merits of the claims.

"The situation is believed by me, and was supposed by Congress, when considering the act of June 19 (20), 1878, to be largely attributable to the encouragement to filing claims contained in the law as it previously stood.

"The communication addressed to you alludes to the fact that before the enactment of the statutes which were repealed or modified by the act of June 19 (20), 1878, it was the custom to deliver the pension certificates to the attorneys. It is the fact that such was the custom, and it is also the fact that the abuses which grew out of that custom and the law authorizing attorneys to draw the pension upon powers of attorney was the reason for the passage of the act of July 8, 1870, to which I invite attention. The provisions for the payment of the attorney's fee by the pension agent were substituted in that act for the former practice of delivering the certificate to the attorney, evidently with a view of protecting the pensioner from the cupidity of the attorney; but while it has measurably protected the pensioner, experience has shown that it has encouraged the filing of claims against the Government to such an extent that the present enactment was deemed necessary to protect the Government in that direction.

"If the request of the claim agents that the pensioner's certificate of title be delivered into their hands, to be held as security for their fees, shall be granted, little will be gained by the act of Congress, for that would practically nullify that portion of the act which proposes to leave the claim agents to their own efforts for the collection of their fees. Besides, such a course would be a practical disregard by the Department of section 4745, Revised Statutes, which declares void every 'pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer of any right, claim, or interest in any pension.' And in view of the provisions of section 4766, Revised Statute, requiring the pension to be paid directly to the pensioner, such a disposition of the pension certificate would often embarrass both the Government and the pensioners in making the quarterly payment, as it would frequently happen that the pensioner would not have his certificate to exhibit to the magistrate upon the execution of his pay voucher, as he is required to do.

"It is proper to add in reply to the suggestion made by the claim agents of the dishonesty of the claimants in general, by reason of which, without security, they will not be able to recover their fees in a majority of cases, that I do not entertain so poor an opinion of claimants who present honest claims. It is not in my judgment at all necessary to adopt the view presented by the claim agents in this respect; and even conceding that pension claimants will not pay their attorneys who aid them unless compelled to do so, the attorney has his complete remedy. Under the act of June 19 (20), 1878, he may collect his fee in advance, in whole or in part, without regard to whether he will be finally successful in the case; and if the claimant has confidence in the merit of his claim he will not object to making a small advance to cover actual disbursements and a portion of the services of his attorney, if required to do so."

Without stopping to canvass the reasons given by Mr. Bentley for the passage of the act of June 20, 1878, I may in short say that, in my opinion, they were and are wholly insufficient, and that the beneficial results which were expected to follow its passage have not been realized; that instead of the number of pension claims coming in being reduced, they have been filed in largely increased numbers; and instead of the ranks of attorneys and claim agents becoming depleted, they have been swollen to still larger proportions and increased, injuriously in quality and in quantity, from 4,000 to 16,000, as estimated by a firm of reputable claim agents of this city.

To illustrate his idea that the guarantee of the payment of the claim agents' or attorneys' fees, as provided in the act of July 8, 1870, "operated as an encouragement both to claim agents and to claimants to present and prosecute claims for pension," and that in consequence thereof arose the necessity of the passage of the act of June 20, 1878, Mr. Bentley calls attention to the increase in the number of claims filed during the four years ending June 30, 1878, over those filed in the four immediately preceding ones, or the four years ending June 30, 1874. From Table V, on page 31 of my last annual report, it appears that during the last-named period invalid Army pension claims were filed as follows:

1873	8,728
1874	9,302
Total	35,724

And for the first-named period there were filed in—

1875	11,926
1876	17,030
1877	16,532
1878	18,812
Total	64,300

This shows the increase in the number of claims filed during the four years ending June 30, 1878, over the number filed during the immediately preceding four years to have been 28,576.

In all these eight years the fees of claim agents and attorneys were allowed and paid, under the provisions of the act of July 8, 1870, and the subsequent revisals thereof, as hereinbefore indicated. It is unnecessary to inquire into either the cause of the argument or its soundness, or to try to discover whether other causes than the fee laws were or were not instrumental and used in causing such increase in the number of pension claims filed in this office during the period of time alluded to. But if this increase necessitated the passage of the act of June 20, 1878, what shall be said of the enormous increase in the number of pension claims filed, commencing immediately after the passage of that act? Turning again to Table V, it will be seen that for the four years immediately succeeding its passage there were filed Army invalid-pension claims as follows:

1881	18,455
Total	194,967

This number is not only in excess of the number filed during either of the periods of four years named by Mr. Bentley, but is more than 94,000 in excess of the number filed during both, or the entire period of eight years. And it will be seen from Table V, on page 86 of my last annual report, that there were filed in this office during the last fiscal year 35,069 of this class of claims, or more than double the number filed in any one of the eight years named by Mr. Bentley, except one (1878), and largely in excess of the number filed in any one of the twenty-one preceding years, except the years 1879 and 1880. And there have been filed during the first seven months of the present fiscal year 12,909 claims, an average of more than 2,500 per month.

This vast increase in the number of Army invalid claims, filed since the passage of the act of June 20, 1878, is unquestionably due to its passage, or rather to the system inaugurated by claim agents and attorneys, on the promulgation of the unfortunate decision of Mr. Bentley that they had the right to demand and receive their fees, in whole or in part, in claims filed subsequent to its passage, before the allowance of the same.

That Mr. Bentley acted from the best and purest motives in recommending the passage of the act referred to, and in the full belief that its provisions would conserve alike the interests of honest pension claimants and of the Government, there can be no question; nor that he acted from the same motives in promulgating his decision above referred to. Nor is there any reason to doubt that if he could have foreseen the results which have followed the passage of the act, or the effect of his decision, that he would never have recommended the passage of the one or have promulgated the other.

Being firmly of the opinion that the passage of the act under consideration had worked and was working injuriously to the interests of claimants and claim agents, as well as to those of the Government, I expressed my views thereon, which will be found under the head of "agents and attorneys," on the ninth page of my report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and are reported in and found on page 16 of my report for the last fiscal year, as follows, to wit:

"In my opinion the actual results of the enactment of June 20, 1878, have been deleterious to the interests of the claimants and agents alike; to claimants, in that the abolishment of the contingency of success and the removal of the security to the agents have stimulated many irresponsible persons, who could be of no possible service to the claimants, to invite a general application of soldiers for pension regardless of disabilities incurred, by which after filing the claim they may obtain in advance the legal fee of $10, and thenceforth abandon the claim, thus encumbering the files of the office and hindering and delaying meritorious claimants; to the agents, by degrading the profession and bringing into disrepute an otherwise legitimate employment. Agents in good standing and well informed in pension law and practice, when their fee depended upon the successful prosecution of the claim, would, and I believe did, examine and scrutinize the merits before risking years of labor and refuse to file cases without merit. Unpleasant friction between the principal and agent was avoided by the contingent fee and security of payment, because of the identity of interests.

"I recommend that Congress re-enact the laws in force prior to June 20, 1878, upon this subject, and make such provision as will protect the Department and claimant alike from ignorant and useless agents, and protect and assist well-informed and useful ones."

Since those views were expressed, official observation and official experience have fully confirmed my belief in their correctness and justified their utterance. As then, I am now fully satisfied that the act of June 20, 1878, should never have been enacted, and now, as then, I am of the opinion that it should be repealed.

But to return to Mr. Bentley's letter. In it he states that of the large number of claims disposed of during the last two years immediately preceding the date of his letter (July 13, 1878) nearly 50 per cent. of those decided were rejected. This statement was made to show the nature of the character of a very large number of those claims; and, if correct, there would seem to be no room to doubt that at least an equal percentage of those filed since June 20, 1878, have met or will meet when decided the same fate. It is believed that the larger the number of claims filed under the present system is the larger will be the percentage of rejections.

And how can this great influx of unmeritorious pension claims be stopped? Can it be done in any other way than by inhibiting claim agents and attorneys from demanding or receiving their fees in advance? Have they that right now? Was Mr. Bentley's opinion that they had such right under the act of June 20, 1878, a correct view of its provisions? To determine this question we have to consider those provisions in connection with previous acts of Congress in order to get at its intention in its enactment. For this purpose we will have to turn again to the twelfth section of the act of July 4, 1864, which prohibited claim agents and attorneys from demanding or receiving their fee in any pension claim in whole or in part until "such pension shall be obtained."

This prohibition was not in so many words carried into the act of July 8, 1870, but it was in effect, for attorneys and claim agents under the provisions of that act could not obtain their fee until the claims for pension had been allowed and the pension certificates issued thereon and transmitted to the United States pension agent at the agency where the pension was made payable, accompanied with an order to pay such fee as was approved by the Commissioner of Pensions if there was a contract, not exceeding $25, or if there was no contract the fee of $10 fixed by law. And these provisions were continued in the act of March 3, 1873, and also in the sections of the Revised Statutes hereinbefore named, and remained in force until the passage of the act of June 20, 1878.

It will thus be seen that from July 4, 1864, to June 20, 1878, Congress jealously guarded the interests of pension claimants and saved them from the expenditure of any money for attorneys' fees until their claims had been allowed. And during the period of time claim agents and attorneys freely and extensively advertised their business, and especially after the passage of the act of July 8, 1870, they sent forth their circulars in vast numbers announcing their readiness and willingness to attend to the prosecution of pension claims on the condition that their fees were not to be paid unless nor until the claims were allowed; and when they filed articles of agreement fixing the amount of fee agreed upon the same condition was inserted therein. Nor did they cease to so advertise, and after Mr. Bentley's opinion had been promulgated—and that they did not understand prior to such promulgation that they had any right to demand or receive fees in advance is evidenced by their efforts, as hereinbefore stated, to have the pension certificates, when issued, placed in their hands as security for the payment of their fees; and that the claimants did not so understand it is evidenced by the innumerable letters written by them to this office, after the claim agents had commenced their widespread dunning business, making inquiries whether their attorneys had the right to demand fees in advance and whether it was their duty to pay the same before their claims should be allowed.

But does the act of June 20, 1878, give permission to demand or receive fees in advance? In view of the previous prohibitory provisions of law on the subject, is it reasonable to suppose that Congress intended to have such construction placed on its provisions? The act makes it "unlawful for any attorney, agent, or other person to demand or receive for his services in a pension case a greater sum than $10."

Manifestly this means that a pension claimant shall pay but $10 for all services necessary to complete his case, and that $10 is to be in full satisfaction to any and all persons rendering services in a pension claim. It would be a clear evasion of the law to permit one agent to file the declaration and receive $10 for that service, another to secure a part of the evidence and for his service receive $10, and the third to perform still other service and receive $10 therefor, and so on ad libitum. But if the law be construed as permissive of demanding the fee in advance, the greed of gain will, as it in point of fact often does, lead the agent to concentrate his whole effort in the obtaining the fee of $10, and drop the case when obtained, to allow the repetition of the process by some other agent.

Again, how can the fee be paid for services in a pension case which had not yet been rendered? So long as human nature is human nature, so long will a just regard for the rights of pension claimants require the strictest construction of the law of which it is susceptible in their favor, and a liberal construction of the act of June 20, 1878, would require service before payment.

Aside from the provisions of this act, neither an attorney, claim agent, or any other person who has agreed to prosecute a claim for pension for the sum of $10 has any right to demand payment of the fee, in whole or in part, until he has rendered all the services he stipulated to perform, unless there was an express contract to that effect. Every person of ordinary intelligence knows this to be the law. And the prediction is unhesitatingly ventured that in no instance will there be found a pension claim on file in this office in which any agreement, expressed or implied, was made that the fee should be paid in advance, or in which the claimant understood that he was to pay such fee until the services for the rendition of which it was promised had been performed.

This being the case, compensation can only rightfully follow performance, and consequently the attempts on the part of claim agents and attorneys to collect pay for services not yet performed can only be looked upon as violative of the terms of the implied contract and a gross infringement upon the rights of pension claimants. And persistence in such practice on the part of any claim agent or attorney, after due notice given, ought to be treated as sufficient cause for his disbarment. Should an order or rule of practice to this effect be promulgated, there can be no doubt that there would very soon follow a marked diminution in the number of fraudulent and otherwise unworthy claims filed in this office for adjudication. It would not only afford protection to claimants, but it would save the Government vast expenditures of money in the examination and adjudication of claims possessing no merit. Could this class of claims be excluded, the force in this office would be left free to consider and act upon claims of a better character. Fraudulent claims and claims without merit not only consume time in their examination, but, from the great number of them filed, can not but cast suspicion upon really meritorious claims.

It would thus seem to become a matter of public policy to formulate and promulgate an order or ruling of the nature of the one above indicated, for the protection alike of the interests of claimants and of the Government, and for that purpose the same is most respectfully but earnestly recommended.

Very respectfully,

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

In the Supreme court of the District of Columbia, holding a criminal term.

The United States vs. A. B. Webb. Violating section 5480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The court said:

This indictment is founded on section 5480 of the Revised Statutes; and although that section has frequently been read, yet, as it is the basis of the prosecution, I shall read it again:

"If any person having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud or be affected by their opening or their intending to open," &c.

Under this statute it is necessary to show on the face of the indictment that there was a scheme or artifice to defraud; it must be shown that it was either a successful fraud or an attempt at fraud upon some person else; and, thirdly, it must be shown that it was for the purpose of effecting this fraud upon the party to be defrauded the person who got up the scheme or artifice used the mails of the United States. It is necessary, of course, that the indictment should set out a scheme and artifice to defraud. The first question is whether this indictment does present a scheme or artifice to defraud anybody. Now, I do not propose to go over this indictment word for word and analyze and criticise it; that I did to some extent on a previous occasion when the case was before the court; but I shall content myself with stating what I understand to be the sum and substance of the indictment.

There was a woman who had been the widow of a soldier who died in consequence of a disability contracted in the service of the Government. After his death she remained a widow for some time and then remarried, and her name was Hannah Pratt by her second marriage, and she lived in the State of New Jersey. The facts set out in the indictment are that this defendant having become acquainted with her history, with her husband's history, conceived the idea that he would apply to her to give him a power of attorney to prosecute her claim for pension as the widow of her first husband. Well, it is said that on the facts stated in the indictment she had no claim, no foundation for a claim. There was no manufacture of a story, or an artifice or scheme by the defendant, however, to deceive her in this respect. All the facts in regard to the claim he obtained from her; she swore to them; and the facts are true, so that there was no manufacture of a scheme or artifice in getting up those facts on the part of the defendant. She was not imposed upon. The defendant merely applied to her for her appointment of him as her attorney to prosecute a claim for pension on those facts.

Now, there was no scheme there. Where is the scheme or artifice then? The scheme or artifice, if it exist anywhere, must be that he represented to her that those facts constituted a good claim, and that he would secure the allowance of her claim if she would give him money. The amount was small—$10. It is not stated that she paid him any money. She did not pay him, although she employed him to prosecute the claim. She employed him with a full knowledge of all the facts. No attempt to deceive her by him in regard to those facts. The only attempt set out in the indictment is that he used those undoubted facts to prevail upon her to file the claim for a pension, and to employ him as an attorney to prosecute it. Then the device and artifice ought to be found in his representation as to the validity of the claim. But the indictment does not show that he warranted the claim. The indictment does not pretend that he told her that he could secure the claim. The indictment does not set out anywhere that he assured her that he could recover that claim, but the correspondence, the letter which is set out in the indictment, does give her encouragement to hope for a favorable decision, and on that suggestion emanating from him it was that he asked her to pay him the $10 in advance.

Now, here is a statement, fair statement, made by the defendant before the application, with all the facts in the case, and he encourages her on those facts to apply for a pension. Had he said to her, "I know that these facts are sufficient to constitute a good claim, I warrant this claim, I know it will be allowed," why there might have been some foundation to show that that was an artifice; there would have been a falsehood; because you can not have a scheme or artifice in the meaning of this law without falsehood in it. But where is the falsehood in his representation? There was no falsehood; he did not tell her that she was entitled to her claim. He simply encouraged her to make application and assured her that he would prosecute the claim with fidelity, vigor; that was his habit, and that was all. Well, now, where is the artifice there? Was there a fraud in that? If there was a frand in that, the indictment ought to set out wherein the fraud consisted. Now, this indictment does not say that the Department had decided over and over again that the facts set out in her petition were not sufficient to maintain a claim for a pension.

If these facts that I have stated constitute a basis themselves for this prosecution, then it was necessary that the indictment should set out exactly where the misrepresentation consisted. In what would the falsehood consist if he represented to her that she was entitled to this claim? Well, then, the indictment ought to set out wherein the claim was unfounded. Fraud will not be inferred by a court or by a jury from mere conjecture itself; there must be facts set out to make the fraud. Fraud is an inference of law from facts. There can be no fraud without facts. And the indictment to be good must state the facts sufficient to constitute a fraud. Well, here there was no false representation at all in fact; mere representation that he was an attorney, and that he would prosecute her claim earnestly, diligently, and that he hoped for success. That is about the substance of it. That was his opinion about it. Well, where is the falsehood in that, if it was a falsehood? And if he was not sincere in his declaration, it was an expression of an opinion; and men are not criminally liable for expressing an opinion, and especially are lawyers not subjected to a prosecution for erroneous opinions.

If some member of the bar should write to a gentleman at a distance and say to him: "I understand that you have a title to a certain piece of property in this District and your title is so and so," setting out the links in the title, beginning with the Government itself. "Now, I think that there is a fair chance of recovering this property, if you will employ me and give me a retainer fee." And the client, with all the facts before him, and with this opinion of the lawyer—whether it be a sincere opinion or not, it is an opinion—with all the facts before him, the client says: "Well, you can bring the action. Here is your money." The action is brought, and it fails. Is it possible that any lawyer would contend that that would be the foundation for a criminal prosecution? Why the proposition would not be entertained for a moment by any lawyer.

Now, it is said in the argument here by way of illustration by Mr. Worthington, that if a lawyer were to inducee a client to employ him to bring a suit for the recovery of a claim that had been long since barred by the statute of limitation; and he knew it could not be recovered, that that would be a fraud. I do not think it would.

When I was at the bar myself, an instance occurred thirty years ago. I was employed to bring a suit against the firm of Mills & Seaton on an old claim more than twenty years standing—been barred six times by the statute. And I succeeded and collected the money. Well, those are chances in the profession.

If there is no artifice used to mislead, no falsehood as to facts, then there is no foundation for the charge of this kind. An expression of opinion as to the validity of a claim, the law has always held, is not a fraud. The rules of the law are general. A man may be dishonest in expressing an opinion even, and yet he is not liable to a prosecution for fraud in regard to that; because if a law held one man responsible for his opinion in one case, that was to be the general rule for all cases; and so that every man who happens to express an erroneous opinion it must be left to a jury to decide whether he was honest in it or not. The law is founded on good sense, and it requires an averment of facts and not the expression of an opinion.

Buyers and sellers fill the world; and the seller tries to dispose of his wares, and he lies about the quality of his wares. And the seller, he lies about the quality too, and probably the purchaser lies about his opinion. Generally the seller has the advantage in the number on his side, and yet these things are done knowingly; everybody knows that the man who lies in this way does not believe what he is saying; but the other party has the same right to judge that he has. I speak now of matters of opinion.

In regard to matters of fact: If one man, in dealing with another, makes a statement of fact, or what he claims to be fact, which he knows is false, by which he gains the money or property of the other, he is obtaining money under false pretenses; unless it was in regard to a matter that the other had as good knowledge of as he. If the man to whom he tells the story (his false story) knows about the same things just as well as the man who tells the falsehood, why there is no ground; that is a matter about which both stand upon an equal footing. It is a matter as to which one man has no more advantage than the other. If one man tries to sell a horse to another and the horse is blind, spavined, and there both parties examine the horse. Well, the owner of the animal says: "Here is a sound horse; look at it." The other man looks at the horse's eyes and sees that they are blind; looks at his legs and there is a spavin there, but still he buys him. Well; can the purchaser turn around and go into a criminal court and prosecute the other man for lying to him? No; he is lying about the matter that the other man knew as much about and was as good in it as he himself. The lying must relate to facts that are not known by the other party.

If a man wants to be perfectly secure in his dealings he can say: "You say that this horse is sound? I say that he is not sound; I don't think he is sound." Well, the other says, "I will warrant him." Well, the warranting will hold, but in case of that kind there is no deceit. A man may be liable upon his warrant against the facts, but he is not liable, criminally, unless there is a fraudulent deceit as to facts. There is an action on the case for deceit. It is well known to lawyers—any students who have read law upon that subject know what I have stated. Lord Holte once said, in a case of prosecution of a party for obtaining money under false pretenses, "Why, is the court to protect all the fools in the kingdom?" [Laughter.]

Men are supposed to be able to take care of themselves, generally; and if one man overreaches another he does not give the other the right to go and prosecute him criminally, unless there has been some concealment of facts, some false statement in regard to facts by which the other party is deceived in regard to a matter of fact, of which he has had no opportunity of judging, and not in regard to a matter of opinion.

Now, in this indictment, although there is a great flourish of generalities, charging "with fraudulent intent" and "fraudulent purpose," "design," and all that, in the writing of this letter; but that does not amount to anything at all; those general terms do not amount to anything. The law requires specification; it requires the prosecutor to lay his finger upon fact; to show on the face of the indictment, in the first place, that there is fraud in the case.

Now, this indictment sets out a letter; but the letter, as I have already said, contained no assurance that the claim was good. It merely says: Here are the facts of your case; I have got them from yourself; I will prosecute your claim and try to recover it if you will give me $10. And she, with the full knowledge of all the facts in the case, takes the risk. Now who was deceived there? Was she deceived? Was there any attempt to deceive her? She was not imposed upon, because she did not employ him; and that is evidence in fact that there was no artifice, no scheme. It is a fact to be considered. Here is an indictment which charges an artifice, a scheme, to defraud her upon the face. There is no artifice or scheme to defraud her; and she saw it; she saw it and she did not employ him. The scheme was not successful in employing her so far as her opinion goes; there was no deception as to facts.

Now I may say a word, although it may not be exactly upon a subject which arises on the face of this indictment, but it is connected with the case, so that if this case should ever go to trial it would be a subject of inquiry probably for the rulings of the court.

Now, it is contended on the part of the defense here that the facts set out in this woman's case entitled her to a pension—the fact. And that if this defendant had represented to her that her claim was good she was not then wronged in that opinion. Well, that may be so. I am inclined to that view of the law myself. But I do not know that this court has any authority to revise the decisions of the Commissioner of Pensions The Commissioner of Pensions is the officer of higher authority in matters of pension.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. An appeal lies to the Secretary of the Interior.

The COURT. But there is no appeal to the courts, unless, possibly, there might be a case of mandamus; but the remedy by mandamus is so difficult to maintain, and there are so few courts that have the jurisdiction—this being the only court in the United States that has that jurisdiction in regard to officers of the Government—that we may regard the remedy in the courts as out of the question. The Department of Interior mainly (the Commissioner of Pensions) is the judge who has to decide finally upon these questions; and you must take his decision then, probably, as law, because he is the ultimate judge. He may be wrong in the law, but he is the ultimate judge; and we must submit to his decision, right or wrong.

But then we know that officers change sometimes. The Commissioner of Pensions sometimes goes out, the Secretary of the Interior sometimes goes out, and new officers come in; they come in with different views, and former decisions are overruled. That is often the case. That is often the case in Executive Departments, and it is often the case in courts. A lawyer has the right to take his chances; and althougl. he may believe that under this present sitting of officers his chance may be small to his client, yet, if he honestly believes that his claim is good, he may file the claim there and let it lie—take his chances hereafter of a change in officers.

Now, I want to say a word or two in regard to this law, these laws; but I may say this: that the laws on the subject of pensions have changed so often, there have been so many laws passed and so many repealed, so many amended, and the intervals between an amendment and a restoration of the provisions of these laws have been sometimes so short that a man becomes bewildered; don't know what the effect of the amendment may have, and in this condition of things it would be very strange if a lawyer should be punished for making a mistake in an opinion.

Now, here I hold in my hand the pension laws, decisions, and rulings of the Pension Office, marked 1882. It quotes in these words, on page 39, section 4708, pension laws:

"The remarriage of any widow, dependent mother, or dependent sister entitled to a pension shall not bar her right to such pension to the date of her remarriage, whether the application therefor was filed before or after such marriage; but the remarriage of any widow, dependent mother, or dependent sister having a pension, such pension shall cease."

Now, there is a provision of law which is reported to be in effect in this book in 1882, and this book is circulated among pension agents. Well, if that is the law, the remarriage of this woman was no obstacle to her claim to arrears of pension due her before her marriage to the second husband. That was a law at that time up to as late, at any rate, as the adoption of the Revised Statutes in 1874; and in this book it is inserted and not marked "repealed" on the margin or anything of the kind.

If that law was in existence, then undoubtedly this woman was entitled to her arrears of pension between the death of her first husband and her remarriage. After her remarriage of course she lost the right to a pension. Well, so the matter stood for a number of years. Then the next section, 4709, required that the application should be filed within five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same. Well, that would put an end to this woman's claim, because the claim was not filed within five years; but that section was repealed by the act of 3d of March, 1879. Well, here is another statute, the statute of January 25, 1879, and this statute relates to arrears of pensions. Now, there is a difference between pensions and arrears of pensions. After a pension has been for a considerable time in arrears without being applied for, the law speaks of it as "arrears of pensions;" and this law provides, after section 1, as follows:

The first section probably I ought to have read first. Well, there is nothing in that to interfere with the right of the widow that I see; but on the contrary it directs that the Commissioner of Pensions shall take steps for the purpose of carrying this law into effect, for the purpose of paying these arrears. So that up to the 25th of January, 1879, not only was the widow who had remarried entitled to her arrears of pension between the date of the death of her first husband and her remarriage, but the law of 25th January directs, takes special care that the Commissioner of Pensions shall provide for the payment of such arrears. Now, that was so up to the passage of the act of 7th of August, 1882. Now, this act seems to be in the same line with the last act on the subject. Now, there is a recognition of the widow's right; but she is spoken of as a widow, and if the widow remarry the child or children shall be entitled from the date of the remarriage.

There is nothing in that law to deprive a remarried widow from claiming her arrears of pension; on the contrary, it recognizes her right to an arrears of pension. But there is another law, and that is the act of March 3, 1879; but still that is later than January 25, 1879. The last recognizes the widow's right or the remarried woman's right to a claim for pension. At the same session of Congress and five or six weeks later an act was passed, it is claimed, and took away the right of the widow, and section 11 of that law is in these words. Does it relate to arrears of pension or does it relate to pension? It seems to me that it relates to pensions.

"That if it is not filed prior to the first day of July, 1880, the pension shall commence from the date of filing the application."

Now, it is contended that it was under this law that it became perfectly clear, so absolutely sure, settled thing, that a lawyer who would advise a woman who had been a widow of a soldier and remarried to file her application for arrears of pension was committing a fraud by giving that advice. Was it a fraud? Who can tell? Where's the lawyer? Suppose this thing were relieved of the weight of authority from the executive department. Where is the man that would say that is a clear case? My own individual opinion is that the widow was still entitled to claim her arrears, but not the continuing pension after her remarriage.

Now, what was the condition of things when this crime was committed by Webb? It was said that this crime was committed on the 22d of June, in the year of our Lord 1882. Well, concede what is claimed by the prosecution: this crime was committed on the 22d of June, 1882. On the 7th of August, that same summer, this other law was passed, which gave the widow in my opinion the arrears of pension. That law was probably pending at that time. The lawyer had a right to speculate on the chances of the passage of the law. Even if he believed the Pension Office were right as to the law as it then stood—but in this confusion of legislation, this multiplication of verbiage in the law, if a lawyer should make a mistake, how could it be charged that it was a crime? Hardly charged that it was an error of judgment.

Now, these expressions are thrown out not because they relate to anything that appears on the face of the indictment, but merely with a view to what might take place in case this case was ever brought to a trial before a jury. I see now how impossible it would be for the Government to get a verdict on the facts in such a case as this. I feel, therefore, the more willing to lay hold upon the objection which arises in my mind fairly upon the face of the indictment.

I sustain the demurrer to this indictment.

For the same reasons I shall set aside the decision of the court made a few weeks ago in the Fitzgerald case. The crime committed by Fitzgerald in that case is charged to have been committed on the 25th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1883. Well, that was nine months after the passage of the act of 7th August, 1882; and so, that if the act of August 7, 1882, restored the widow's right, the remarried widow's right, to her pension, it seems to me as a reasonable construction, then, this case is so much stronger than the other case, because, by the act of the 7th of August, 1882, which was not enforced at the time that that crime was committed, because that was committed (if it were a crime) in June, before the passage of the act of 7th of August, 1882; but this case is weaker because of the passage of the act of the 7th of August, 1882.

This offense is not charged to have been committed until the spring of 1883; and as to the other facts upon which I have commented in regard to the Webb case, they are almost identical in both cases. The Fitzgerald case I say is a stronger case than the Webb case.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House, with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, had directed him to report back the same with sundry amendments, and with a recommendation that it be passed as amended.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move the previous question upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole and upon ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed for a third reading.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the passage of the bill, on which the rules require that the yeas and nays be taken.

Mr. HANCOCK. I presume the hour for the recess will arrive before the call of the yeas and nays can be concluded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. By unanimous consent the bill might go over, and the yeas and nays be taken to-morrow morning.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the call of the roll be commenced, it must be concluded before the Chair announces the recess.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 180, nays 2, not voting 140; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with Mr. CLARDY on political questions; but on this question, as we would have both voted the same way, I have voted.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. FYAN with Mr. PETTIBONE, until further notice.

Mr. RANKIN with Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, until further notice.

Mr. COOK with Mr. CULLEN, until further notice.

Mr. SHELLEY with Mr. THOMAS, until further notice.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. CALKINS, until further notice.

Mr. MOULTON with Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, until further notice.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. BRUMM, until further notice.

Mr. GIBSON with Mr. SMALLS, until further notice.

Mr. LEWIS with Mr. MCCORMICK, until further notice.

Mr. COVINGTON with Mr. HOLTON, until further notice.

Mr. BROADHEAD with Mr. VALENTINE, until further notice.

Mr. KEAN with Mr. DIBBLE, until further notice.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. BREITUNG, until further notice.

Mr. LE FEVRE with Mr. MOREY, until further notice.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HORR, until further notice.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER with Mr. KEIFER, until the 26th.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE with Mr. LIBBEY, until the 24th.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR, until the 24th.

Mr. GREEN with Mr. HOOPER, until May 4.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. MCKINLEY, until April 28.

Mr. O'HARA with Mr. KLEINER, until April 24.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. FORAN with Mr. WADSWORTH.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE, except on the tariff.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. RANNEY.

Mr. MILLS with Mr. ROWELL.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. PAYNE, until April 28.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri, with Mr. PHELPS, until April 25.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. JOHN S. WISE, for to-day.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. SMITH, for to-day.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, for to-day.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. FOLLETT, for this afternoon.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. BURLEIGH, for this day.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, with Mr. PERKINS, on the pension appropriation bill. Mr. PERKINS would vote "ay" and Mr. TURNER "no."

Mr. BRUMM. I was paired on political questions, and not regarding this as one, and in order to make a quorum, I have voted.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. VALENTINE, for three weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. FINDLAY, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. CABELL, from evening sessions, for ten days, on account of sickness.

Mr. HANCOCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., in pursuance of previous order) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. resumed its session.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, the session this evening is for debate only; no business to be transacted.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

THE TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for general debate only on revenue bills.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, knowing that much would be said by gentlemen of very much larger legislative and practical business experience than myself upon the question now before the House, I had about arrived at the conclusion not to occupy the time of the committee; but when I turned to the Census Report and found that there were 1,400 manufacturing industries in my district, I felt that I would be derelict in my duty to my constituents if I permitted this opportunity to pass without raising my voice or entering my solemn protest against the passage of this bill, which, if enacted into a law, will further depress the manufacturing industries and great business interests of the people of this country. It is admitted that most classes of goods were never manufactured at lower prices or with smaller profits than at the present time. If this be true, how then can the manufacturer stand a further reduction of 20 per cent., which of itself in many instances is a greater profit than he now realizes?

The duties are too low now on a number of articles to make it profitable to manufacture them in this country, and so low on others that they afford but little protection. The result is that some industries have been entirely destroyed and others so crippled that they barely exist.

Our manufacturers, having carefully considered the revision of the tariff in the last Congress and its bearings for good or evil upon the productions of their establishments, and by mutal concessions as to wages and profits on the part of the laborer and the manufacturer, had so arranged their affairs as to be able to produce their commodities, except in such instances as have been referred to, at reasonable profits, and to give to their workmen fair but not exorbitant wages.

Relying on the supposed stability of the law, they have gone on in the hope that further changes would not be made, at least in the way of reduction of duties, for some time to come. All the manufacturers ask is fair protection and stability of legislation; so that, when they have once ascertained the amount of foreign and domestic competition, they know how to adjust their business to continue therein at living profits to themselves and good wages to their hands.

What the manufacturer in this country fears the most is competition with cheap foreign capital and labor. In those countries whose capital and labor come most closely in competition with our own the rate of interest on capital is not more than one-half what it commands with us, and the wages of labor are about in the same proportion. Cheap capital and low wages give the foreign manufacturer a vast advantage over our dear capital and good wages. And hence it becomes the patriotic duty of Congress, legislating for the whole nation, to enact such laws as will enable our citizens to enter into fair competition with the people of other lands.

Unfortunately our legislation has been of a halting, hesitating, and uncertain character so far as the admission of foreign commodities into the country and in competition with our own is concerned.

Many tariffs general and special have been enacted within the last twenty or thirty years, and as soon as the manufacturer has adjusted his business to the new order of things, and is making satisfactory progress, a new system of duties is enacted, and he is compelled to change his machinery and business to meet the changed state of affairs, frequently at great loss to himself, and of consequence to those whom he may employ.

This constant tinkering with the tariff and ever-varying system of duties is embarrassing to all business enterprise, and checks the prosperity of the people. If we could only maintain a permanent and steady system of duties, all who engage in enterprises that produce commodities which come into competition with foreign products would know exactly how to arrange their affairs so as to meet the competition thus forced on us by cheap capital and low wages of labor. It is true that American enterprise can almost always adjust itself in time to the new order of things. But in so doing it is at considerable expense and much embarrassment.

The tariff of 1883 was an innovation on preceding tariffs, but our people were with few exceptions gradually accommodating themselves to its provisions. Now we are threatened with a new revision, and upon an entirely different principle from what has heretofore been established. The agitation of the subject has already had a disturbing effect upon some of the industries of the country, and men whose capital is embarked in business enterprises are awaiting with anxiety our legislation on the subject in this Congress. The present tariff is not as satisfactory as it should be, but the proposed revision has not been asked for by any considerable body of men or the people. No masses of men have been so injured by the existing laws, or if they have they have not yet had time to find it out so as to call for relief; but, on the other hand, numerous committees representing great communities have protested against any changes of duties until the laws on the subject as they now stand shall make manifest the full effect of their operation.

The proposed tariff can not be regarded as a business man's tariff, but a scheme of politicians and doctrinaires. The former think that political capital can be made out of it; the latter think that it will be a triumph of their particular beliefs; the former hope by it to obtain political power and possession of the government; the latter, the propagation of their politico-economic theories. All this is done under the thin veil of a love of the people. It is not based on any scientific, logical, or commercial principles. As the cost of production and the demand and the supply of different commodities are continually changing, and not in fixed proportions to each other, so must duties change in unequal proportions; on articles that are subject to similar duties this year it may be right and proper to affix different duties a year or two henceforth.

Foreign competition in certain articles may be greater than in others, and thus require greater duties on imports to enable our people to compete with the cheap labor and capital that produced them. To such considerations the proposed tariff (House bill No. 5893) has no reference. It ignores them all; it has reference to a single idea, namely, the reduction of the national revenues by a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent. on the duties imposed by the tariff of 1883. This is not a principle, it is only an experiment. In this, however, its promoters will probably suffer disappointment.

Low duties do not always reduce revenues; generally speaking, they increase them by reason of the increased importations of cheap foreign commodities. While the evil of a plethoric treasury is not thereby avoided, a greater evil is incurred in the crippling or destruction of American industries, with the concomitant suffering imposed on the workingmen of the nation. The 20 per cent. is a premium offered to the foreign manufacturer, as it enables him to throw his products into our markets, and sell them at a less cost here than heretofore, and at the same time at increased profit over the cost of production.

When a foreign manufacturer can sell any kind of iron at $20 per ton with a duty on it of $6 per ton, if the duty should be decreased to $5 per ton he can sell his iron at $19 per ton under the proposed tariff and make 20 cents more on each ton than he did before the reduction of the duty. In this way the American consumer does not get the whole benefit of the reduction of the duty; a greater or less portion goes to the foreigner. In some cases the former gets no benefit at all.

There is another very objectionable feature in this bill, and that is the application of ad valorem rates to so many of our importations. It is well known that frauds are constantly practiced upon the Government by undervaluation, which results in loss of revenue, and is unjust to the honest manufacturer. Instead of endeavoring to avoid existing evils, you are opening the door to a very large increase if you pass this bill.

It is notorious that the foreign manufacturer has the advantage over the American manufacturer of from 50 to 100 per cent. in his cheaper capital and labor, and if foreign products of such labor were admitted duty free our manufactures would be driven from the market and the country would be supplied with goods of foreign manufacturers. The lower the duties the nearer to this state of things will our country come.

If a tariff should be so adjusted as to give the foreigner the command of our market the first result would probably be to furnish us cheaper commodities, but as soon as his command of the market became complete our furnaces, forges, cotton and woolen manufactories would be closed, and the laboring population would be thrown out of employment or forced into some other uncongenial occupations, such as agriculture or commerce, probably already filled and incapable of bearing further competition. Then would come a struggle for existence such as this country has never seen. The capitalist would have closed his works because of their unprofitableness. Although he would suffer, yet his means would enable him to wait for better times. Such a crisis, while it is a matter of inconvenience and a cessation of profits, does not necessarily work suffering to him. Not so, however, with the workingman. When the demand for his labor ceases his capital and profits are gone. With loss of wages come want and suffering. No more then for him are the comforts of a well-provided home; no food and raiment of a better quality for his wife and children; no books and papers for his own and children's intellectual welfare; nothing but poverty, with scarcely a ray of hope for the future, awaits him.

You may say that this is an overdrawn picture. It is not so, the half has not been told, as hundreds of persons who have visited the manufacturing districts of England and Scotland will testify. What says that earnest, conscientious man, the late secretary of the Tariff Commission, Robert Porter, of the condition of the laboring classes in Manchester and Dundee?

In the former some of the houses had bare wooden floors, some had red-brick floors, some had bare flag-stones. Hardly one had a vestige of carpet. By far the largest proportion of the operatives live from hand to mouth, generally in one room, in which a few chairs, a deal table, a bedstead, four or five cups and saucers, a few dishes and plates, a wash-tub, a sauce-pan, and a kettle comprise the chief articles of furniture. Everything in many cases, including the sleeping and family washing, is done in the general room. An old shawl and a dirty print gown, and wooden shoes, which clatter on the sidewalk, form their toilet.

Of Dundee, in the spinning and weaving districts, he says:

The wages are not over $2.25 per week, and the best of the workingmen only live from hand to mouth and in squalid misery. In some districts the operatives live in houses totally unfit for human habitations; the are low one-story buildings, with but one room on a floor and windows about two feet square. I actually found in some whole families living like animals on the bare ground; and in one the mother of a family lay dying literally of starvation! The children were poor, pinched, half-starved little creatures. I visited at least a dozen houses in this part of Dundee and found the inmates almost all in the same state of misery and want. In one district alone 50,000 operatives were receiving alms annually. They lived principally on bread.

This testimony of the social condition of these people is further corroborated by the American consul, Mr. Wells, whose report is just issued from the State Department. He says:

Skilled artisans get $6.87 per week, laborers $4.75, boiler-makers $8.50. In the jute and linen works $2.50 per week is the average. These working people are poorly provided for in the way of house accommodations. There are in Dundee 8,620 houses of one room only, in which there is a population of 23,670, and 16,187 houses of two rooms into which are crowded 74,374 men, women, and children. If to these be added the three-roomed houses, with the people living in them, it shows that 118,000 of the 140,000 inhabitants of this community live in houses of one to three rooms. The rents are as follows: For a three-roomed house, $77.50; for a two-roomed, $48 per year, payable semi-annually, and for a one-roomed house, 60 to 75 cents per week. It will be seen that a large proportion of these people live in houses of one and two rooms each, and especially upon these poor denizens the devastation of infectious diseases almost entirely falls. Statistics show that nine-tenths of the deaths are from fevers.

Many of these habitations are wretched in the extreme, containing little furniture, and occasionally are without even a bed. In some of these hovels five or six human beings are sheltered, with nothing to lie on but the floor, and covering themselves with jute burlaps which they take in to make into hand-sewed bags.

A manufacturer of my district who visited England several years before Mr. Porter related the same sad story of the condition of these people.

Humanity revolts at such scenes of poverty and wretchedness, and yet there is in this country and in this House a powerful party who will at the first opportunity force this iniquitous starvation system of free trade upon our people.

I have said on other occasions, and will repeat it here, that if the protective principle is to be entirely eliminated from our tariff, and free trade to prevail, every mechanic and workingman in our mills, furnaces, and other classes of manufactories may at once prepare for a reduction of wages corresponding to those of foreign countries. If they do not, every cotton and woolen factory, every rolling-mill and forge will stand idle; and even with submission, poverty, degradation, and, in some instances, starvation will be its sequel.

Self-preservation is the first law of nature. Therefore to protect ourselves against the pauper labor of foreign lands can be no crime. Some one has said that "protection is Pennsylvania's birthright and we do not intend to trade it off for free trade." No, not even to place it in the hands of one of her own sons born of noble Whig ancestry, but if chosen as your candidate for the Presidency will be compelled to stand on a platform false to the principles of protection to American industry and in direct opposition to the principles which his father, in his day so ably advocated and defended.

It is true that the bill under consideration does not contemplate free trade pure and simple, yet it does reduce duties on our principal industries to such an extent as to peril the prosperity of many of them. At present they are working on a narrow margin, and a small reduction of duties would work serious harm, ruining some and injuring all.

Let us now examine a few of the imports. Take iron and steel in their various forms; cotton, woolen, and leather goods. It appears from the report of the Bureau of Commerce and Navigation for 1883 that we imported of those articles in that fiscal year to the amount of $40,837,000, and of cotton manufactures we imported $32,359,000 worth; of woolen manufactures we imported to the value of $51,044, and of leather to the amount of $12,653,000; total, $136,893,000. A very large portion of these commodities could have been manufactured in this country under higher duties; but if the reduced rates as provided by the bill are to be allowed to prevail, the amount of imports of those articles will be greatly increased, while our own productions of a similar character will be diminished.

With regard to iron, the census of 1880 tells us that in that year there were in the United States 1,430 establishments for its manufacture, employing 159,536 hands and paying them $62,778,548 in wages and creating $335,949,591 of products. In the manufacture of cotton goods there were 1,005 establishments, employing 185,365 hands, of whom 121,365 were women and children, paying $45,614,419 in wages and in products to the wealth of the nation $210,950,383 per annum. In woolen goods (omitting carpets, felt goods, hosiery, and worsteds) there were 1,990 establishments, employing 86,504 hands, of whom 40,526 were women and children, paying $25,836,392 in wages, and adding $160,606,721 to our national wealth each year. Thus we see in these three industries alone there are 4,425 establishments, employing 367,405 hands, paying them $134,229,529 in wages, and creating productions to the amount of $707,506,705 in a single year.

These figures are large, but when we read the statistics of all the mechanical and manufacturing industries the figures are simply amazing. The Census Report of 1880 gives the whole number of our mechanical and manufacturing establishments as 253,852, with a capital of $2,790,272,606, employing 2,025,335 male hands above 16 years of age, 531,639 females above 15 years old, 181,921 children and youths; paying them $947,953,795 per annum; using 3,396,823,549 in materials, and creating $5,369,579,191 of finished products in a year for the markets of our own country and the outside world. A large proportion of these industries will be more or less affected by the reduction of duties as proposed by this bill, for the decrease of duties will be followed by an increase of importations, and will not only displace that amount of our productions, but will lessen the demand for our home labor and will lower the wages of the workingman.

Should the proposed reduction of 20 per cent. result in the displacement of our products of labor to such an extent as to force down wages only 5 per cent. to meet the foreign competitor, it would result in a loss to the American artisans and mechanics of nearly $50,000,000 per annum in their wages. To this, Mr. Chairman, they will never submit any longer than returning elections shall give them an opportunity to right a wrong. They can not afford to take the low wages of other countries and pay the high prices for living that are entailed on the mechanic and laboring man in those countries.

To show the disparity of the condition between our own workingmen and those of European nations whose commodities come into competition with ours, I insert a comparative table of the prices of the necessaries of life and the rates of wages in the United States and Europe, as condensed by Mr. Spofford, our Librarian, from the report of the Secretary of State on the state of labor in Europe; from which it will be seen that the foreign laborer receives much lower wages and has to pay more for the cost of provisions than the American worker. This is the latest report from official sources.

Our consul stationed at Cologne, Germany, reports: Masons, per day, 70 cents; carpenters, per day, 50 to 72 cents; engine-fitters, per day, 71 to 77 cents; blacksmiths, per day, 67 to 71 cents. In this country the same mechanics get from $2.25 to $2.75 per day for the same kind of labor.

There is no instance, probably, where the benefits of a protective tariff have been more strikingly exhibited than in the manufacture of steel rails. When they were first introduced they were imported at a cost of $150 in gold per ton. Congress saw the importance of fostering the industry in our own country, and at once put on a duty sufficiently great to compete with similar manufactures abroad, and the result was that in a very few years we could manufacture a superior article at a low cost, and steel rails can be bought in the markets to-day for $35 to $40 per ton. This great reduction gave an impetus to the railroad system of the United States, and from 31,286 miles of railroad in 1861 the mileage has increased to 117,717 miles in 1883—more than all Europe combined, extending the blessings of railroad facilities through all the States and Territories, at the same time giving employment both in the building and the running of these roads to thousands of people. This was a great boon to the young farmer, and especially those of small means, who felt compelled to go West to make a living and who hoped to increase their fortunes by the gradual increase in the value of lands.

As soon as the railroad was built within a reasonable distance of him he found at the nearest railroad depot or station a cash market for the products of his mountain or prairie farm. But it was not the farming interests alone in the far West that were benefited by the railroad interests which were built up by the protection given to American industries. The great mineral wealth of that section was likewise fostered and developed enormously by freer access and cheaper freights.

The report of the Tariff Commission gives the following comparative table of wages in the iron trade in England and in Pittsburgh, Pa.:

Edward Young, former Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, having gone aboard under the auspices of the Government to gather statistics of this character, made the following report:

Wages in rolling-mills in 1878, per week.

	Middlesborough, England.	Pennsylvania.
Puddlers	$10 50	$21 15
Top and bottom rollers	16 05	27 50

Attempts are being made almost constantly to induce the farmer to believe that the duty on iron necessarily increases the cost of his agricultural machinery and that the tariff generally is a burden to him. But the average farmer has sufficient intelligence not to be caught with such sophisms. He has learned enough to assure him that it is a triple advantage. In the first place, the duty on the component parts of agricultural machinery enabled our mechanics to have a fair chance in our own markets, and the consequence is that 1,943 agricultural establishments were in operation in 1880, competing with each other, reducing prices, and making $68,640,486 worth of implements for the farmer. If it were not for these manufactories, which furnish the machinery for sowing and reaping, the vast prairies of the West would to a large extent be unbroken, but now, with little bodily labor to the husbandman, they are raising large crops of grain, which these railroads carry at reasonable rates to the seaboard, a portion of which, after those engaged in mechanical and other pursuits in our own country are fed, is sent abroad to feed the people of other nations. The great advantage that the farmer reaps under a system of protection to domestic industries is that wherever a manufactory is established it furnishes a market for his products.

On the borders of my district flows the river Schuylkill. From Philadelphia to Reading, Pa., its banks bear an almost continuous line of iron, woolen, and cotton manufactories. A few miles farther north runs the Lehigh; its banks from Easton to Mauch Chunk are dotted with manufacturing establishments equally busy producing national wealth. In the county of Montgomery, one of the counties which I have the honor to represent, there are, as shown by the census of 1880, 840 manufacturing establishments, with $13,789,709 of capital employed, using materials to the amount of $13,189,461, and producing $20,656,993 worth of material annually. There are 11,638 persons employed daily; this includes men, women, and children. The total amount of wages paid in the year was $3,596,298 and the average per capita was $309 annually. The net profits of these 840 establishments is shown to be $3,043,711, and to each individual manufacturer $3,625 annually.

What I desire to show is: First, that these manufactories support 37,295 persons, and as they are consumers and not producers of agricultural products they make for the farmer a market, and, as it were, at his own door. Such a market enhances the value of his land, and should he desire to sell it to engage in some other occupation or to retire from labor, he will find that he can obtain a much higher price for it than he could have done before the manufactory was established near him.

As corroborative evidence of the assertion that it not only makes him a market at his door but a better and more diversified market, and that his land is worth more per acre by reason of its proximity to it, I would refer you to the statistics furnished in a report from the Agricultural Department.

In the seven manufacturing States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware the total value of manufactured articles is $3,021,405,831; total number of acres under cultivation, 53,919,546; the value of the farm lands alone $2,552,695,060, and the average value per acre $47.34.

We will now take the second group of seven States, with very much less manufacturing and themselves remote from the manufacturing centers, namely: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois. Total value of manufactures, $1,247,046,686; total number of acres under cultivation, $105,587,433; total value of farm lands, $3,558,969,239, and the average value per acre, $33.71; a difference of over 44 per cent.

My district, with 1,400 manufacturing establishments, joins Philadelphia, with 8,567 manufacturing establishments. The farm land, by reason of its proximity to this great market, is worth from $125 to $500 per acre; the nearer the market the higher the price, as much of it is used for vegetables and small fruits, known as truck-farming.

The appreciation of the value of a home market is shown by the actions of the people of my little town, who have advertised in the Philadelphia papers, through their council, that they would give a certain number of acres of land and would exempt from municipal taxation the property of any individual, company, or corporation who would erect and carry on any unobjectionable manufacturing business in said borough which would employ not less than one hundred hands.

In the second place I desire to remind the committee that it is not the farmer alone who is benefited by these manufactories: the shopkeeper, the shoemaker, the carpenter, the tailor, the hatter, in fact all the different occupations and professions are mutually encouraged and built up wherever the people are largely engaged in manufacturing industries. But the farmer has, in addition to the benefits mentioned, a direct protection in the duties laid upon a number of articles that he produces. By the schedule prepared at the request of the Committee on Ways and Means, and attached to the bill, it appears that the producer of flax-straw is protected by the existing tariff $5 per ton; flax, not hackeled or dressed, $20 per ton; dressed flax, $40 a ton; tow of flax and hemp, $10 per ton; hemp, $25 per ton. Sugars, 2¾ to 3½ cents per pound; wools, from 10 to 36 cents per pound; on butter and cheese, 4 cents per pound; on hams, bacon, and lard, 2 cents per pound; on wheat and barley, 20 cents per bushel; on corn, oats, and corn-meal, 10 cents per bushel; potatoes, 15 cents per bushel; and on other products various rates of duty. Surely the farmer and planter can not complain that they do not receive any benefit from a properly adjusted tariff.

But you say the farmer needs no protection on his productions. Let us look at this for a moment. The Bureau of Statistics gives the following importations of agricultural products into this country during the years 1882 and 1883:

Live animals	$4,000,000
Breadstuffs and farinaceous foods	12,667,000
Fruit	18,000,000
Hay	1,000,000
Potatoes	1,000,000
Provisions of various kinds	1,800,000
Butter	939,000
Rice	1,893,406
Total	41,299,406

And it is the opinion of the best-informed political economists that the farmer will soon need a much higher protection on his cereal products to prevent importation of like products into this country to feed the millions of our people who are employed in manufactures and different pursuits other than agriculture. It is an admitted fact that we can no longer rely upon a foreign market for their consumption. British America, India, Australia, and Russia are building railroads and improving their facilities to make cheaper transportation.

India alone has increased her exports of wheat enormously in the last four years. In 1880 she exported 4,000,000 bushels; in 1881, 12,000,000 bushels; and in 1883, 36,000,000 bushels. Her soil is fertile and well adapted to wheat-raising. It is said that the rates of freight from India and Russia to Liverpool are no higher than from the United States to Liverpool. Her rate of wages, although having risen 100 per cent. in the last thirty years, is now about 8 cents per day; farm labor can be had for 5 cents per day.

It is with this pauper labor we will have to compete in our exports of grain; and at the rate they are increasing their annual products we will not only be compelled to give up the foreign market, except in times of failure, but they will be knocking very soon at the doors of our ports with their cereal products. Then you will find that the farmer will plead as he has never pleaded before for protection, and instead of 20 cents per bushel on wheat and barley he will want perhaps three times that amount. It is said that wheat can be produced at a profit in India for 30 cents a bushel.

There are employed in agricultural pursuits in the United States 7,670,493. If these people are to compete with the pauper labor of India and Russia in the production of wheat and other cereals, they of all others will stand most in need of protection.

But the farmer will say, or you do for him, that you must lower your duties on manufactured goods, then the foreign manufacturer can afford to exchange his goods for our wheat and flour. This argument has been strongly urged by the other side of the House. You have heard of the "man who held the penny so near his eyes that he could not see the dollar."

Let us look into this policy and see if agriculture can live without manufactures. All past experience teaches us that no nation can be prosperous on agriculture alone. For examples look at Egypt, Turkey, India, Ireland, Norway, and Sweden, countries almost wholly given up to agricultural pursuits. Labor in Sweden is worth 7 cents per day, in India and Turkey from 5 to 8 cents per day. England furnishes most of these people with their manufactured articles. In the first place it must be borne in mind that 92½ per cent. of our agricultural products, except cotton, are consumed at home, and the remainder, 7½ per cent., is exported. Now, the question arises would it be best for us to give up our own market by throwing these people out of mechanical employment, or had we best do all we can to hold the home market and as much of the foreign as is possible without destroying our own? We also find that 98 per cent. of all our manufactured products are consumed in our own country. Out of $5,369,519,191 of manufactured articles only $111,890,001 are exported. It would be better to sink the 7½ per cent. of agricultural products in the sea than to lose the market for the whole $5,369,579,191, which would be the inevitable result if we cease to protect our own industries.

"No; there is another alternative left," you will say; "let the manufacturer reduce his profits and his workingmen their wages if they want to compete with the foreign manufacturer." Let us follow out this logic. There are paid out in the United States in salary and wage labor $6,000,000,000 annually. Reduce this amount to the same standard paid in foreign countries. The amount then would not exceed $3,000,000,000 or $4,000,000,000. By this procedure you would reduce the purchasing power of these people to the same extent you reduced their wages. But you would do more than this; you would drive thousands from the loom and the spindle, from the forge and the furnace, into agriculture, where they would become your competitors instead of your consumers.

It is enough to say that the farmer is not so ignorant and deficient in common sense as not to know that a tariff that would diminish the ability to buy of all those engaged in our mining and manufacturing industries would seriously cripple his market. The home market is his main dependence, and he can not afford to support a policy which would be ruinous to his interests.

Mr. Chairman, I fail to see who in this country would be benefited by the proposed reduction. At least no producer, be he farmer, manufacturer, miner, mechanic, or skilled or unskilled workman, would be benefited. But the foreign manufacturer and the importer would be greatly benefited.

It is claimed that there is another class who would be benefited, and who have constituted themselves into a league, known as the Free Trade League of America, with their headquarters at New York. Every member of this House has been flooded with its literature, and the Committee of Ways and Means have listened to their sophistries presented by paid counsel. The members of this league are shown to be, by Mr. RUSSELL, of this House, men of large fortunes, living on their incomes, "who measure day by day the purchasing power of their fixed incomes as they apply it to the articles of high living," as they term them. As Mr. RUSSELL has well said, the number of men who live entirely upon their incomes is entirely too small to shape our industrial policy. These are the gentry who send to Europe for their clothing; nothing good enough manufactured in this country for them to wear. They are the agents of the Free Trade Cobden Club for distributing free-trade documents throughout the United States. They are the supporters of the free-trade journals known as the London Iron and Coal Trades Review, Iron Monger, London Spectator, and Pall Mall Gazette.

Let us see how they regard the election of Mr. CARLISLE Speaker of this House and the Morrison tariff bill:

The London Iron and Coal Trades Review, for December 7, 1883, says:

Our best customer for iron, steel, hardwares, and many other goods has long been the United States, notwithstanding the very heavy duties that are there levied, and the greatest interest is always manifested by our business men in American politics where they are likely to affect the tariff. It is pretty evident that the protectionists are no longer to have it all their own way, and consumers may before long have the right of buying in the cheapest market, wherever that may be.

The Machinery Market, a London publication, said in January last:

The year is likely to see important political changes on the other side of the Atlantic, which will have their influence on business here. Events move rapidly in America, and the coming triumph of the Democratic party there means the triumph of the free-trade movement in the States. It is not to be supposed that there will be free imports into the States; but "a tariff for revenue only," which is the leading cry of the Democrats, will open an immense additional field for the sale of English manufactured goods in the States.

The same journal said in March last:

Although our exports of machinery and hardware to the States have slightly increased, taken on the whole, during the last few years, our exports thither of iron and steel and their manufactures show a marked decline during recent years. The value under this heading amounts for the month of January last to about £395,000. It appears, therefore, on the whole, we are buying nearly as much in the way of manufactures in iron and steel, machinery, &c., from the States as we are selling to them. The result must be looked upon as miserable, and is not equal to our position as a manufacturing country. The United States is a producing country, not a manufacturing, in the sense to which we apply this term to ourselves. It is high time we turned our attention actively elsewhere for a better customer, not forgetting at the same to watch the opportunities which the tariff reduction in the States will open out to us.

The London Iron and Coal Trades Review, for February 8, 1884, says:

Though our trade with the United States has fallen off very much of late, that country still occupies the position of our leading customer, and every change in its condition yet has its influence upon our market. It is, therefore, important to notice that the intelligence from the other side has been of a rather more encouraging character during the last few days. The consumption of pig-iron now balances the production (though this is not because the former has increased; it is because the latter has been reduced), and with small competition prices will doubtless improve. At present, and for some time past, there has been little chance of supplying English pig-iron at a profit in the States, owing to the very low prices of native iron. But the most satisfactory news is that on Monday Mr. MORRISON, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, introduced another tariff bill in the House of Representatives. Considering that it was only last year that a tariff bill was passed which considerably reduced the duties on a large number of articles, the introduction of another bill so soon affords a sign that the protective doctrine is a good deal 'played out.' The new bill proposes a reduction of 20 per cent. in the duties, to take effect from July 1, but no relief will be given in the matter of luxuries. Mr. MORRISON and his colleagues who have drawn up the bill have shown their wisdom in placing in the free-list a number of raw materials, such as copper and iron ores, slack, and coal. Though the bill may not pass without considerable modification, it will probably result in a substantial reduction.

To these opinions we may add the following blunt but frank admission by the London Spectator on the 8th of December last:

Of course the north of England holds that American free trade would be greatly to the interest of British manufacturers.

And this from the Pall Mall Gazette:

The progress of the Morrison bill will be watched with considerable interest by English exporters to the American market, inasmuch as it can hardly fail to tend in their favor.

Thus you see how closely and with what deep interest the manufacturers of England are watching every move made by this Congress in the interest of free trade. Their only hope is in the success of the bill and the further success of the Democratic party in the coming elections, when they look for a tariff for "revenue only."

Protection to our infant industries for a series of years has had a beneficial effect in reducing the cost of many articles, so that we now obtain them far below the price charged for the foreign article. When the English had command of our markets we were compelled to pay from $15 to $19 per dozen for their saws. But now under the fostering care of protective duties we are no longer subjected to their exorbitant charges, for Disston and others supply us at nearly half the cost, and they send them to England and there sell them for $10 per dozen. The same may be said in reference to our shovels. The Rowlands, of Cheltenham, Pa., and the Ameses, of Massachusetts, supply us, and send large quantities abroad. Myers & Ervien, of my district, make, with others, all the forks we need, and ship largely to England, Ireland, France, Germany, Prussia, Russia, and Australia. All this was impossible when duties were low and our manufacturers unprotected.

Last autumn I had the pleasure of visiting the little town of Pullman, Ill., which is composed entirely of mechanics and operatives engaged in car-building. I found at this place a savings-bank which had only been established last May. I found that these people had on deposit in that bank $170,000, and that the daily deposits made by these 2,500 workingmen were about $500. This led me to investigate the matter somewhat further. I found that in 1883 there were 2,876,438 depositors in the savings-banks of the country, whose aggregate deposits amounted to $1,024,856,787, making an average to each depositor of $356. These were nearly altogether the savings of the workingman, laid away either to buy for himself a home or for a season of adversity, if one should come, and in the mean time affording him an income in addition to that arising from his labor.

The advocates of free trade insist that the exchange of products between nations should be as free as possible, some even insisting that revenue for the expenses of Government should be raised by direct taxation. They cite England as a nation that comes nearest to a free-trade country of any one among civilized nations. They point to her great commercial prosperity, her wealth, power, and extended dominions. They do not point, however, to her laboring population, who are starving on low wages. They are careful not to allude to the fact that her farm hands can scarcely earn enough to buy the cheapest kinds of food and clothing, and that the workmen of her mills and manufactories are among the worst fed and the worst clothed of any laboring people of Europe. Neither do they allude to the fact that six out of every one hundred of England's subjects are the inmates of an almshouse or receiving outdoor relief, and that 3.68 per cent. of the whole population of Great Britain and Ireland is in a similar condition.

Considering further the fact that 4,698,098 of the people of Great Britain emigrated to the United States between the years 1820 and 1879, presumably to better their condition, it would seem that that kingdom was not the paradise of the laborer, and considering also the fact that Europe sent to our shores between 1820 and 1883 the enormous number of 12,196,295 of her people, it would appear that they are not afraid of the "oppression" of a country whose people live under a protective tariff system. This tide of emigration, continually increasing by letters from emigrants here to their friends at home, is a convincing proof that the down-trodden and oppressed people of Europe consider this country the paradise of the workingman. And unless England especially does something to improve the condition of the laboring classes the time is not far distant when certain portions of her dominion will be almost depopulated. Her whole system is wrong. If she would pay her working people better wages they would then become consumers. But what workingman in England can wear a broadcloth coat, or what workingwoman can wear a silk dress? What working man or woman there can eat meat even once a day, or bread baked from wheat flour spread with good wholesome dairy butter? By their system of free trade and low wages they degrade, impoverish, and starve their people, and as a consequence destroy their home market.

The people of America pursue an entirely different policy. We believe in fair wages to the workingman and workingwoman, so that they may enjoy the comforts of home life. We believe in free education, so that their children may be fitted to enter any of the professions or other avocations of life; to not only occupy our seats in the Halls of Congress, but, if needs be, to become the Chief Magistrate of the nation, the highest office in the gift of the American people. We have at least two illustrious examples of men who under the fostering influence of our system of protection and free institutions have been called to fill that exalted position, namely, Lincoln and Garfield. The poor farmer in this country is not known by his blouse and the workingman by his check, which must be worn in free-trade Europe to show to which class they belong. Said the lamented Garfield:

Thank God and thank the founders of the Republic and the later patriots who have made the Declaration of Independence a reality, here in America there are no classes! Our society does not resemble the crust of the earth with its impassable barriers of rock, but resembles rather the waters of the mighty sea, deep, broad, boundless, but yet so free in all its parts that the drop which mingles with the sand at its bottom is free to rise through all the mass of waters until it flashes on the crest of the highest wave. There is no boy in America, however humble his birth or in whatever capacity his lot may be cast, who if he has a strong arm, a clear head, and a brave heart, may not by the light of our schools and the freedom of our laws rise until he shall stand foremost in the honor and confidence of his country. Not so in England.

Says an editor of an English periodical:

I have studied the agricultural interests of my country carefully for twenty-five years, and I have never known one, not one, who was born and reared in the ranks of mere farm laborers that ever rose above his class and became a well-to-do citizen.

What a sad commentary on the feudal free-trade system of his country.

Mr. Chairman, I am a protectionist. By that I do not mean that I am in favor of a prohibitory tariff that would exclude all foreign products from our country, but I do mean that I am in favor of such duties as will give to American workmen protection against the cheaper labor and capital of other lands. This is all that is needed; for with his superior education, inventive genius, his skill, his improved machinery, his indomitable energy, he will be able to compete with any and all in the great struggles of life.

The principle of protection is as old as the Constitution itself. It was inaugurated by the First Congress of the United States on the 4th day of July, 1789, in the very second act that was passed, as follows:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported:

Be it enacted, &c.

That principle has been steadily advocated by almost every administration since then. It had been recognized and favored by Washington, Hamilton, Franklin, and by the Democratic Presidents, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson, and by none more earnestly than by a late Democratic candidate for the Presidency, Horace Greeley. The Democratic party should not forsake or abandon the principles of its time-honored leaders under a senseless cry of "A tariff for revenue only." The principle of protection has become interwoven with our whole national policy, and though frequently attacked and sometimes crippled by insidious enemies it must survive, while the parties that attack it will be lost and forgotten. It is a natural, not an artificial policy. It is the same policy which in the discharge of a natural duty actuates men to aid and assist their families and friends, and a Government that will not protect its own citizens and give them aid and comfort in their undertakings can not expect them to be willing or able to give it a very hearty support.

The prosperity of the citizen is a part of the prosperity of the nation, and when the citizen fails to secure a competence the Government is a sufferer in proportion.

Following, then, in the footsteps and traditions of the early statesmen of the Republic, as manifested from time to time in their tariff systems, I believe with them in the policy of adequate and sure protection to American industry. I believe that American workmen should have the preference in doing the work that may be required to be done for the benefit of the American people. Believing also that the present bill, if enacted into a law, would deprive them of that preference and allow an impolitic interference by foreign competition of cheap labor, I most earnestly protest against the passage of this bill, and hope that there is wisdom enough still left in this Democratic House to defeat it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Chairman, the great object of all civilized governments is to protect the person and property of its subjects or citizens. The money to pay the expenses of our Government is principally raised by duties upon imports, and the present law, known as the tariff law, discriminates between the rich and the poor. This is not just and ought to be remedied, and it can only be remedied by a complete revision of the tariff. I have hundreds of constituents who support their families by the labor of their hands, that pay a greater sum into the Treasury than many of my constituents who are worth from one hundred thousand to half a million of dollars. The poor man has nothing for the Government to protect but his personal rights, while the rich man's property is to be protected as well as his personal rights. It was not the intention of the founders of this Government that such manifest injustice should be practiced. It was the intention that every citizen should receive full protection of his person and property, and that he should pay toward the expense of the Government in proportion to his means and the amount of property he had to protect.

The tariff can not be so adjusted or arranged as to make the rich pay their due proportion of taxes, but it can be so arranged as to approximate it. The only way to reach the wealthy is by an income tax, which ought to be levied upon every man receiving his income from interest-bearing notes, bonds (private or public), and stocks, whether railroad, mining, or manufacturing; for all the profits which are derived from these sources are paid by the producers and laborers of the country.

A protective tariff is not in accordance with the spirit of our institutions, is contrary to sound political economy, and is a destructive policy for this and all other countries. All legislation which seeks to build up a prosperous nation by permitting a comparatively small and privileged class of manufacturers and producers to levy for their personal benefit an inordinate tax tribute upon the great mass of the people who are compelled to use and consume their goods is unjust, unwise, and ruinous.

There are no natural and there should be no artificial objections to buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market—it is the inalienable right of every freeman.

The Government must be supported with dignity and honor, must pay all its obligations, and to do this the Government is justified in imposing a moderate, non-exclusive, and non-protective tariff duty, the sole purpose and effect of which shall be to meet its necessities—such tariff for Government benefit only. Such a tariff is what is meant by free trade by the Democratic party and all others who oppose a protective tariff system.

The heaviest burden now borne by the American people is the unjust, unfair, robber-like system known as a protective tariff. It is no more nor less than a bonus levied upon a very large majority for the benefit of a few manufacturers, which compels them to pay much higher prices for almost every manufactured article they are compelled to consume.

By increasing enormously the cost of living a protective tariff oppresses the laborer and the farmer, and by its operation has destroyed our merchant marine, while it has fostered and enriched monopolies by impoverishing the great mass of farmers and laborers.

The protective system is only kept in existence by the most corrupt system of lobbying, extravagance, and official corruption, which it tends to produce and extend.

The present system is on many articles exclusive, and by thus preventing importations of foreign goods deprives the Government of the opportunity of deriving a legitimate revenue by a moderate tariff and of reducing the price of the domestic article as well as of imported goods. All industries worthy of existence can be maintained and flourish independent of hot-house, artificial aid. If they can not, the Government has no right to call upon one class of the people for aid by taxing them for the benefit of those who have invested their money in a profitless business.

Those who favor a protective system say that without it the price of labor would be so reduced that the laboring classes of the community could not subsist.

To what laboring class of community do they refer? Simply to those employed by the great manufacturing monopolies of our country, and not to the millions of farmers, mechanics, and others employed in all other avocations, all of whom pay tribute to these huge monopolies.

But these claims that the price of labor would necessarily be reduced is not true, as the prices paid to laborers in manufacturing establishments under the old revenue tariff and those paid under the present protective tariff abundantly prove.

They claim that it requires skilled labor for manufacturing purposes, and that skilled labor requires higher prices than unskilled labor.

Let us examine this and see how much higher wages the great monopolies pay their laborers than the common or unskilled laborer receives. Let us see what some of these great monopolies pay their unskilled labor. The census for 1880 shows that there were 805 companies or organizations engaged in the production of iron-ore for that year, and that the production of ore amounted to 7,971,703 tons. The same census shows that there were just 31,668 persons employed by these 805 organizations in this branch of industry.

The same census says this 31,668 persons in 1880 were paid as wages $9,538,117. Now, divide this large sum of money by 300, the number of working days in a year, and you will find it to be $31,793. This, then, is the amount of money paid out each day to 31,668 persons. Now apply division again, and divide $31,793 by 31,668, the number of persons employed, and you will see that each man will receive a fraction over $1 a day wages as the result of protection to American labor in mining iron-ore.

Now, let us take from this same census the skilled labor used by these poor iron monopolies and see what munificent prices this protective system enables them to pay. The value of the iron and steel manufactured in 1880, as shown by the census, was $296,557,685, a far greater sum than the product of iron-ore; and that the total number of persons employed in this work was 140,975, who received in wages for the year 1880 $55,476,785. Now, apply the same rule to these figures by dividing the $55,476,785 by 300, the number of working days in the year, and you will find that $184,922 was paid out each day to all of these workmen, and when you divide this amount paid out each day with 140,975, the number of persons to whom it is paid, we find that each man has received the munificent sum of $1.30 per day; and these are the high prices that the iron monopolists are paying these unskilled and skilled laborers who are putting millions into their pockets yearly by reason of protection, which obliges every man in the United States to pay a bonus for every pound of nails or any tool or implement of iron or steel which he uses.

When we take the wages paid the men who mined the ore at $1 per day, and the wages of the men who worked in the iron-mills in manufacturing iron and steel, which was $1.30 per day, we find that these iron monopolists paid on an average to their employés the great sum of $1.15 per day.

Now, this same census for 1880 contains these facts, as any one can demonstrate who will take the trouble to search the iron statistics. In 1880 there were produced: Pig-iron, 3,780,000 tons; duty, $7 per ton; profits guaranteed by tariff, $25,500,000; bar and rod iron, 808,000 tons; duty, $22.40 per ton; profit from tariff, $18,000,000.

Plate and sheet iron, 532,000 tons; duty, $33.60 per ton; profits from tariff, $18,000,000. Iron rails, 467,000 tons; duty, $15.68 per ton; profits from tariff, $7,500,000. Steel rails, 741,000 tons; tariff, $28 per ton; profits from the tariff, $21,000,000. Steel bars, &c., 242,000 tons; duty, $50 per ton; profits from the tariff, $12,000,000. Other products, 540,000 tons; duty, $22.40 per ton; profits from tariff, $12,000,000.

This is what the tariff did for the iron and steel men for the year 1880—$114,000,000 profit made by virtue of the tariff. At the same time they could only pay the men who did the labor to produce these immense profits the beggarly sum of $1.15 per day.

Out of whose pockets did this $114,000,000 come and into whose pockets did it go?

This same census shows that the woolen, cotton, leather, and hundreds of other manufacturers whose goods are protected by a high duty pay their laborers but a trifle more wages than the same class of workmen receive in England, which is a free-trade country.

Again, this same census shows that in 1880 in the State of Michigan there were 4,873 manufactories of all kinds; and that the number of persons employed in all these factories was 77,591, and that the total amount of wages paid these employés for that year was $25,313,682. Divide this amount of money by 300, the number of working days in a year, and we have $843,789, the amount paid each day for wages; and when this sum is again divided by the number of persons who were employed it shows that there was paid each person employed a fraction less than $1.09 per day, showing what extraordinary high wages these manufacturers do pay; and yet they cry, "Reduce the tariff and you reduce wages."

The fact is, labor is like any commodity; its price depends upon the law of supply and demand; and no matter whether these protected manufacturers are making 25 or 50 per cent. upon their capital, they will hire their workmen just as cheap as they can.

The question of taxation is the one great question of the day. This high protective tariff was the offspring of the manufacturers when they saw the necessity of raising large revenues to pay the expenses of the war and to pay the debt which it produced, and long since it was needed for that purpose they have, by organized lobbies and paid writers, succeeded in preventing its modification, until the people have demanded, by their election to this Congress of a large majority who favor it, a complete remodeling of this outrageous tariff system now in existence.

The election of the presiding officer of this House was proof conclusive of the feeling and determination of the people. I say people, because those who are in earnest in favor of tariff reform are not all of the Democratic party.

The strife for Speaker was not for men. All three of the men who received Democratic votes had the entire confidence of the Democratic members of the House. The question was simply "tariff reform or a continuance of the protective system;" and note the result—one hundred and thirty-six for reform to fifty-two for protection.

The protective system is doomed, or else the people are doomed to slavery.

A people can not long prosper under a system which draws from their hard earnings annually millions to enrich and build up a few monopolists, who are already worth their ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, and a hundred millions each—not one dollar of it earned by their own labor, but every cent of it earned by the farmers, mechanics, and laboring classes, and paid over to them through the machinery of this legal robbery known as a protective tariff.

This demand for tariff reform has not been made for party purposes. The people have asked that the burdens of taxation be more equitably distributed and that they be lessened, as the Government is raising more than an economical administration of affairs requires.

The Republican party is responsible for its being made a political issue. They know that the great majority of manufacturers, the railroad kings, the monopolists of all classes, upon whom they can depend for money to pay the expenses of political campaigns, belong to their party, and with the money furnished by these men who are directly interested in having this protective system continued, and by the aid of over 100,000 Federal office-holders, they believe they can beat the people in their demand for this reform.

I am glad that this issue has been forced upon the Democratic party, for by it will the Republican party lose a heavy per cent. of its voters. The farmers, mechanics, and laboring men who are asking, nay, demanding these reforms, care nothing for party traditions, and thousands of voters who have acted with the Republican party will no longer submit to the enormous and unequal taxation which is the result of this outrageous protective system.

Let the issue be squarely made, "protective tariff" on the one side and a "tariff for revenue only" on the other, and then, with all the money that the monopolists will pay into the election fund and with the legion of Federal office-holders upon the one side, and the tax-ridden people upon the other, we will be able to see whether money and patronage can induce the people to continue a party in power whose central idea is in direct and absolute opposition to their best interest.

It is true this issue will lose to the Democratic party many voters, notably in Pennsylvania and the New England States, for not all of these manufacturing lords belong to the Republican party; but those States are Republican anyway, and can be no more so under this issue than any other.

The great agricultural States, who are forced to pay this tribute-money to Pennsylvania and the New England States, are fully aroused, and determined that their demand for more equitable taxation shall be respected.

They are tired of paying $2 extra upon every thousand feet of lumber in their fences, their houses, and barns, and from 2 to 5 cents per pound for their wire fences; from 25 to 60 per cent. upon the dishes from which they eat their humble meals; from 1½ to 2 cents per pound on all the nails in their fences and buildings; 1 cent and upward for every pound of iron in their farming tools and implements; and, in short, to pay from 40 to 100 per cent. on every manufactured thing they buy, from the diaper that covers their baby's limbs to the shroud and coffin that envelop their dead and the shovel that digs their graves.

They know, too, that not a dollar of all this colossal tax, which for the whole country is estimated to amount to more than five hundred millions annually, goes into the Treasury of the United States. It swells the millions of the owners of the mines of Lake Superior and Pennsylvania, most of whom reside in Boston; it rolls up wealth for a couple dozen men, more or less, who own all the standing pine in the State of Michigan and Wisconsin; it builds palaces and buys fast horses for the owners of the salt-wells; it makes princely fortunes for the few, while the many gravitate toward pauperism.

Since this system has been in force in this country a few men have grown rich beyond the wildest dreams of previous times, while the millions have for the first time in the history of the country come to know what the want of bread is. Wherever it has been most rigidly applied—as in Pennsylvania—there the rich have grown richest and the poor have grown poorest, and American freemen in relation to their employers have become most like slaves.

And it is upon this outrageous system of robbery that the Republican leaders are asking the people to continue it in power. Can it be possible the people will longer submit to the continuance in power of a party whose cardinal principle will sooner or later make them slaves?

I voted a few days since to restore the tariff upon wool. Some claim that this was inconsistent with my views as a tariff reformer. I think it is not. The last Republican Congress reduced the tariff on wool and increased it on woolen goods. I believe this was unfair, and against the interest of the farmer and in favor of the manufacturer of woolen goods.

I was in favor of restoring the duty on wool, and then let it stand the 20 per cent. cut with woolen goods which this bill would give it, which would be more equal and just. Had the tariff on wool been restored, until this bill became a law the price of woolen goods would not have advanced a particle, because home manufacturers of woolen goods would have to sell in competition with imported woolen goods, and the advanced cost of wool would have been entirely at the expense of the manufacturer, and woolen goods would not have cost the consumer any more than they now do.

This view, I think, was taken by the Republican members of the States where the woolen factories exist, as nearly all of them either dodged the vote or voted against restoring the duty on wool, because they saw it would be against the interest of the manufacturer of woolen goods to raise the price of the raw material.

With the exception of the members representing the woolen factories, the same Republican party who last year voted to reduce the tariff on wool voted to restore it, showing that what they claimed last year to be right this year they claim to be wrong. I do not abate one jot or tittle from my opposition to a protective system, but I believe that farmers should have a fair chance with the manufacturers and no more. They do not ask special privileges; they simply demand equal justice to all alike, and this they do not get under the present tariff law.

They are willing that the duty on wool, which is the only thing they produce upon which a tariff is of any sort of benefit, shall be cut down whenever there shall be a reduction upon woolen goods and upon almost every article they consume, so as to equalize and reduce taxation to the necessities of the legitimate expenses of the Government economically administered. The duty on wool not being restored, I shall be obliged to vote to reduce the tariff on wool 20 per cent., as fixed in this bill, or lose the opportunity of voting to reduce the tariff 20 per cent. upon hundreds of articles used by the farmers and the laboring people throughout the country. I therefore deem it in the interest of the farmer and laboring classes to vote for this bill, though it cuts down the tariff on wool.

I do not consider this bill as coming up to what the people demand or expect. It makes no pretensions to the correcting the inequalities of the present tariff law, but strikes off 20 per cent. indiscriminately, while it puts a few articles upon the free-list. But as it affords some relief, I am willing to vote for it, and trust that future legislation will afford the relief which the people so imperatively demand—a tariff system which will equalize taxation between the producers of the raw material, the manufacturer, and the consumer, and so as to raise no more revenue than is actually required to pay the expenses of an economical administration of the Government.

Mr. CANNON addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, in the opening of this discussion the vanguard of the opposition was led by the "father of the House," the learned statesman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], in a very eloquent and pathetic speech. Regarding him as the essential exponent of the protectionists, and his utterances as ex cathedra, I did myself the pleasure to hear every word he said. He drew a pitiable picture of the pauperism of England; he went abroad to study "the short and simple annals of the poor" and find examples of wretchedness and misery. While listening intently to his graphic recitals and melancholy description of the want and woe of foreign humanity I wondered to myself if it had ever occurred to the distinguished gentleman that there was such a thing as a cisatlantic poverty.

Have we no poor among us? Are there none here whose energies have been paralyzed by hunger; whose brains have been overthrown and whose hearts have been broken by the degradation of penury? Have we no wretched tenement houses with squalid inmates; no stout, able-bodied men who rack their minds to invent some methods for the procurement of the bread of the morrow; no wasted women and mendicant children? Have our crowded cities no destitute? Are all our sons of toil prosperous? Are there no striking, hunger-maddened operatives in American Birminghams and Manchesters? I doubt not that spectacles as sad and gaunt as those observed by the gentleman in England could with less difficult search be discovered in this "land of the free and the home of the brave."

Is there not fast growing up in happy, proud America an aristocracy of wealth? Is not pauperism continually increasing? I think no reflecting man can hope to successfully dispute the assertion that in "these ends of the earth" misrule and mal-legislation have produced millionaires and paupers with equal pace. Have not high tariffs and class enactments increased the riches of the rich and degraded the poverty of the poor? For every capitalist there is more than one tramp. The time was in this country when plutocrats were scarce; the time is when they abound. The time was, within the memory of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], when there was not a millionaire in the United States; the time is when every great city can furnish a score. The time was when almshouses and "soup-troughs" were not needed; the time is when the tired and dejected and hungry poor are glad to partake of any public or private charity. The time was when republican simplicity was a virtue; the time is when purse-proud and supercilious native Americans are aping royalty. The time was when our laws were made for the benefit of all; the time is when they are enacted for the special advantage of the few. The time was when all patriots felt a community of interest in universal prosperity; the time is when avarice seeks to dominate our councils and the pen of greed to indite our statutes. The time was when political righteousness exalted our nation; the time is when political sin and legislative injustice are a reproach to our people. The time is coming in the near future, if not now at hand, when American freemen will express their sovereignty, assert their power, and vindicate their majesty, and demand of their servants, in a manner that will enforce obedience, that every species of class legislation, every statutory inequality, every selfish act shall be expunged from the records of our national law.

It were practically impossible at this day for any man to suggest anything new or essentially different from the manifold thought and treatment which the subject of Federal taxation has received in this country from time to time. It has engaged the attention and inspired the research of governmental philosophers for more than a century, and statesmen and essayists have in turn given it their current contributions. It has been so oft discussed, critically considered, and profoundly explored that the very language employed is generic, the platitudes identical, the illustrations parallel, the methods threadbare. With a very slight adjustment of transposition, and the elimination of modern data, it will be discovered upon close inspection that much of our recent literature upon this subject is but the adroit reproduction of what was said scores of years ago.

I can not, therefore, hope to attract this committee or interest the country by the presentation of any purely original ideas or the submission of any fresh or newly invented measures of policy. I may not even escape the appearance of plagiarism, and may both wittingly and unconsciously appropriate the thoughts and expressions of greater men who have gone before me. And yet, as a representative of the people, I have felt called upon to express myself and formulate my convictions, as best I can, upon what I conceive to be the most important question which is to-day before the country. It is, in my judgment, not only of paramount national magnitude, but constitutes the boundary line which separates the great political parties which are contending for the administration of the Government.

No greater, graver, or more difficult and responsible function belongs to Congress than that involved in tax legislation, and nothing should receive more careful scrutiny and patriotic investigation. The modes of State taxation are clearly indicated, practically exemplified, and thoroughly understood. The citizen of the town, county, or State, by reference to his tax receipts, if not from a draft upon his memory, can tell just how much he is required annually to contribute out of his substance toward the support of his local government. He is able to reduce it to mathematical exactness, for the figures are at his command and the processes are familiar to him. The tax assessor and collector came to him in succession and practically instructed him in a manner not mysterious nor difficult of comprehension; and the instrumentalities employed were direct, positive, and intelligible, the objects of the exactions were distinctly within his cognition, and that, too, whether he were well versed in political economy or non-conversant with state-craft, whether lettered or unlearned. The transfer from the private pocket to the public treasury was simple, though perhaps severe.

The Federal approaches to the citizen's purse are complex, indirect, and circumstantial, and hence obstructive to ordinary understanding. What manner of man in this great Government can readily answer, or answer at all, and indicate with anything approaching accuracy, the amount of money in dollars and cents required of him during the year just past, or any year within the last score, in support of the United States? Who on this floor could furnish the information? A distinguished statesman in the Forty-sixth Congress and now an honored member of this House [Mr. HURD] said:

> The statistics will show that every head of a family who receives $400 a year in wages pays at least $100 on account of protection.

This estimate would show that the laboring man who has a family has extracted from him one-fourth of his annual earnings "on account of protection," not for the support of his Government, but to advance special interests and promote individual welfare. It would have been a most tedious if not impossible task for any American tax-payer, I care not how skillful in mathematics or conversant with Federal statutes or expert in custom-house rules and regulations he may have been, to have commenced on the 1st day of January, 1883, with all the lights before him, and by the most scrupulous observance of his food and raiment, investments and expenditures, specifics and ad valorems, every art and part of the cost of his daily life, up to the 1st day of January, 1884, and then told how much taxes he paid to the General Government during the year, either in separate items or aggregate amounts; and the problem would be still more embarrassing if it involved the segregation of the legitimate contributions to governmental support from those which went to the benefit of class interests through maltaxation.

A great metropolitan journal (New York Herald, February 15, 1883), speaking upon this subject, announced the following startling statement:

> We do not exaggerate in the least when we assert that there are not fifty men in the country, including experts, who can go over either the House or the Senate tariff bill and say without the most elaborate study and careful calculations what its numerous provisions mean, or in which of them the present rate of taxation is increased and in which lowered. Even an expert in iron and steel finds the wools and woolens schedules totally unintelligible to him. An expert in woolens can not comprehend the metal schedule; and as to the average citizen, at least two-thirds of both these bills would be as unintelligible to him as Hebrew or Arabic. And this is a law under which we are all to live.

Statesmen of confessedly great capabilities in the last Congress admitted their want of familiarity with the provisions of the bills which proposed to tax the people. It does seem that in a country like ours the laws on so important a subject ought to be so constructed as to enable the citizen to comprehend his relation as a tax-payer. Free and sovereign people are not content to be kept in groping incertitude upon a question so vitally affecting them. The very substruction of our institutions is the virtue and intelligence of the people and the consent of the governed. Simplicity is putatively a distinguishing characteristic of republican government, and its very genius rests upon the foundation that each man is a factor in its composition, with full privilege of participation in the exercise of political power and a perfect right to have the laws defined with such perspicuity as may be adapted to his comprehension. Tax laws unduly rigorous and inexplicable are doubly abominable.

I crave the indulgence of the committee if in the discussion of the pending bill I enter at some length into the consideration of doctrinal and fundamental propositions. I can not to my own satisfaction discuss the question apart from certain basic principles which I think ought to control tariff legislation:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.—Article 1, section 8, Constitution.

These words appear in the forefront of granted power, first in the enumeration of delegated Federal authority under this all-important section, and were manifestly foremost in importance in the minds of the framers of our organic law. From them are to be gathered legislative warrant for the levy and collection of taxes. The power is not only specifically expressed, but the objects and purposes of its exercise are carefully limited and well defined. No constitutional taxation can be imposed except to promote and legitimately subserve the ends designed.

The desiderata in tariff laws are constitutional authority, the public weal, uniformity, and simplicity. I have been reared in that school of politics whose primary lesson is the non-exercise of doubtful powers. The first thing learned by an American citizen in connection with his civic conditions ought to be that his country has a written constitution, upon which its entire organism is predicated, and furnishing the supreme guide for his political faith and practice. No legislator can afford to support any measure which has not for its warrant, "Thus saith the Constitution."

Every Representative here is the trustee of his people, an agent acting under a specific power of attorney, and bound to the observance of his instructions not merely by his responsibility to his constituency but by the most sacred obligation that can operate upon the conscience of man. Upon any proposition of Federal legislation we are logically referred to these special instructions, and a faithful consultation thereof is our reasonable duty. Permit me to say that I have marked with regret and humiliation the indifference and at times outright derision with which constitutional allusions and objections have been received and treated upon this floor.

I have observed with pain the pointless efforts at ridicule which have been directed against those, some of them venerable in the public service and sound in patriotism, who have sought to prevent infractions of the Constitution. There is a visible relaxation of fidelity and devotion to this great charter of popular liberty; the ligaments that connect the hearts of some of us thereto, I solemnly fear, are giving way. Such things, in my humble judgment, prognosticate a decadence of national vigor and an inevitable destruction of republican polity. When it shall happen that we utterly lose sight of fealty to and reverence for the Constitution of the fathers Freedom will leave us, and carry on the wings of its returnless flight every hope and confidence in the integrity and perpetuity of our institutions.

If we tax the people as intended and limited by the Constitution we must do so in order to pay the debts of the Government and to subserve the general well-being of the country. I do not believe that debt is a blessing, but a burden to be removed. I do not believe that the perpetuation of the national indebtedness will conduce to national prosperity, nor do I regard as dangerous the legitimate accumulation of the means to discharge the same. If a tariff system be adopted with a view to raising revenue taxation will be lighter, the necessities of life cheaper, and the public Treasury can sooner respond to obligations in the hands of national creditors. Reduction of tariff duties, governed by a revenue standard, implies not a decrease but an increase of money in the Treasury.

A high tariff levied for protection lessens the amount of import duties and diminishes the public revenues. The American Protectionist, perhaps the ablest journalistic champion of high taxation in this country, in its issue of May 19, 1883, says:

> Tariff for revenue would naturally raise more [revenue] than a protective tariff, while under the protective system if too much come in the simple and obvious remedy would be to raise the tariff and thereby decrease the importations.

In the views of the minority upon the bill now under consideration is to be found a corresponding statement, as follows:

> This proposed reduction will inevitably increase foreign importations, and, as a consequence, will, as all experience teaches, increase our revenues.

When the importations are decreased by protective duties the revenues are diminished, the means of "paying the debts" are embarrassed and curtailed; and to raise the tariff in order to reduce or prevent the accumulation of the revenues is to ignore and violate the Constitution, to oppress the people with high prices for what they are obliged to have, to compel them to pay tribute in aid of private business, and to impair "the general welfare" for the benefit of special classes. To carry out this idea to its logical sequence the Constitution should be reversed and read as follows:

> Congress shall have power to lay taxes to prevent importations, to avoid and indefinitely postpone the payment of the debts, and to promote the special welfare of certain classes of the people at public expense, and without regard to uniformity.

It will require just such a construction as this implies of this clause of the Constitution to sustain the reasoning of the protectionists and to find authority for the tariff laws which have been in operation for so many years. That is "general welfare" which secures the greatest good to the greatest number. The organic law and the patriots who made it never for a moment contemplated any species of class legislation.

The central idea, the mud-sill of our Government, is that all men are equal; that one man is as good as another; that there shall be "exact justice to all and exclusive privileges to none." The converse of this is odious to every true American. Where in express language or by any sort of rational implication is to be found the semblance of constitutional authority for laying the burdens of taxation upon the shoulders of the many for the benefit of the few? Where in the philosophy of our system of government is to be found the right of any man to invoke and receive such legislative assistance to advance his private business to the detriment of others? I am one of those who believe that in this period of our national greatness, if private enterprise, personal vocation, and individual employment can not prosper by their own spontaneous forces and native energies, and without the auxiliary and extraneous support of legislation, then their business activities had better cease in the interest of the general good and common prosperity.

It is a poor business that will not afford its own advantages, furnish its own rewards, and control its own results, and ought to be abandoned. It is simply and obviously unjust to take from the substance and products of other pursuits to prop and support that which is not self-sustaining. The unconstitutionality, the apparent inequality, the palpable injustice of a protective tariff, it seems to me, ought to furnish all-sufficient objections to its continuance. I love and admire that statesman who introspects his own motives, analyzes his own sense of personal rectitude, and upon any public measure propounds the self-interrogatory "Is it right?" and admeasures his conduct by the response.

A tariff judiciously and equitably levied, with an eye single to constitutional terms and purposes, is not objectionable. Although the word is distasteful and its etymology refers us to historic spoliation, still it is the constitutional method for the obtention of revenue, and there is no immediate prospect of its disuse. It will be time enough to talk of absolute free trade when the public debt is liquidated.

In order to raise revenue for governmental purposes it is a fact that the tariff must draw its supplies, in the main, from articles in common use and for which there is a general demand. I believe in making all dispensable and luxurious commodities contribute as far as possible to the support of the Government, and upon all such I would impose all the burdens they can bear, with profit to the common revenue fund. I wish it were so that we could run the Government upon such receipts; but that is not possible. A very large per cent. might be assessed upon diamonds, for instance, and if no evasion of duties were to occur the amount of taxes derived therefrom would not be considerable.

The value of importations from this source for the twelve months ending December 31, 1883, under what, at first blush, would seem to be comparatively a very low rate of duty, was only $372,397. The highest possible duties might be attached to rare and costly articles, and yet the importation thereof would be of necessity so limited as to bring but little money into the Treasury; because being used almost exclusively by the rich, and hence a minority of the people, the demand therefor is confined to that class and the use thereof purely voluntary. Let luxuries, I repeat, stand all the tax they can, with benefit to the Government; but it will not do to contend that the needed revenues or any very considerable amount thereof by imposts can be drawn from such sources. With a prohibitory tariff they would not be imported; with a well-adjusted revenue tariff they would add their part to the general fund.

The contrast presented in the difference between the duty on a diamond and that on a blanket is very striking (and that on the latter is iniquitous); but it is useless to say that they will each bear the same rate with profit to the Government. More people use blankets than diamonds; blankets they are obliged to have; diamonds must be dispensed with by some and can be by all. The wool of the sheep is in universal demand; the hair of the camel only partial. There are more blankets than diamonds, more sheep than dromedaries. We use more sugar than civet; one is sold by the hogshead, the other by the ounce. The demand for iron is greater than that for lace, for common metals than delicate embroidery. Besides, minute and imponderable substances can be concealed and smuggled and duties thereon evaded; but bulky materials can not escape inspection. This will serve to emphasize the idea that the taxes are essentially derived from those commodities which enter into daily use and consumption. It would not, I think, be extravagant to assert that seven-tenths of our annual imposts are thereby supplied.

But while this is the case, the cardinal purpose in the mind of the legislator should be to so reduce taxation as to make subsistence cheap and render all necessary articles as inexpensive as possible to the great majority of the people, and at the same time operate to produce the required revenue; and to this end I do not favor the abolition of the excise on whisky, because it may be made to lighten the burdens which oppress the necessaries of life.

Any theory of taxation which has for its foundation discrimination in favor of classes or particular individuals at the expense of the greatest number of the people is unsound in policy and unjust in result. If we must have a tariff, let its proportionate burdens be borne by all. Let us not make "fish" of one industry and "flesh" of another. Let not the so-called "business interests" of the country have any greater exemption from tariff reductions, or enjoy more privileges of draining the public, than the producers of the crude materials.

What is business? Is it confined to those who manufacture what others have produced? That is a business interest which is honestly engaged in any honest labor. Honest work, whether of mind or hand, is equal in dignity. It would be wrong to place the raw materials produced in the United States on the free-list and assess high duties upon the manufactures thereof; and it would be equally inequitable to make manufactures free and the raw materials dutiable. The furnace and spindle, the shop and the arts, are not above the pick and the shovel, the field and the flock. The man who works in the shade or at the forge and employs scientific machinery is not superior to him who toils in the sun or exploits the ores of the earth and utilizes his physical brawn.

The capitalist who converts the crude elements into the finished fabrics should not be preferred over him who invests his means in the procurement of the original materials. The "general welfare" will be conserved by treating all alike. We occupy too high a position among the nations of the world, possess too many resources of native independence, to be unwilling or afraid to do right and act justly with each and all of our citizens. We can not afford to show any favoritism in our legislative enactments. No reason for fostering the interests of one portion of our people, for protecting the business enterprises of one locality, for upbuilding one more than another, at the expense and to the detriment of the great mass, now exists.

The present is an age of air-lines and transcontinentals, of electric miracles and potent motors; enterprise is stimulated to its highest pitch; every industry is supplemented by all the appliances of modern science; the harp of the era is attuned to the music of progress; the surges of time and human capability have beaten back the shores of our primitive conditions; we are no longer an inchoate nation, but one of the great powers of the earth, able to assert ourselves in competition with the nationalities of the universe. We have yet a boundless area of uncultivated and productive soil, upon which millions of thrifty, earnest people may find homes, and from which may be derived "bread to the eater and seed to the sower;" the opportunities for earning an honest livelihood are not stinted; everywhere the bounties of nature solicit the hand of art and labor. The danger with us is that in our phenomenal development we may lose sight of first principles; that plutocracy, class interest, corporate influence, and lesions of the Constitution, by gradual and insinuating encroachments, may eventually undermine the political structure which the fathers built.

That plan of taxation which proceeds on the ad valorem idea is the simplest, most equitable, and most easily comprehended. I do not believe in the combination of ad valorem and specific duties upon the same article where it can possibly be avoided. I want to see our duties so simplified that a colloquy with the merchant can apprise the customer of the exact amount of tax the consumer is required to pay upon a given article, so that the observant citizen may be able to ascertain how and to what extent he contributes to the support of his General Government. If the people could only know and fully realize the burdens they are compelled to bear, and the purposes of their imposition; if the present Federal levies were made upon them by direct taxation after the methods pursued by the State governments, such a revolt, such a storm of public indignation would be raised, as would sweep away, with irresistible force, every vestige of protection which deforms our statute-books.

Mr. Chairman, I am in cordial sympathy with the essential purpose of the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. As a general thing it is a movement in the right direction, but it does not in all respects commend itself to my unqualified approval; for as I conceive it falls short of accomplishing all the needed reform, and at best is but a conservative approach thereto. I should have much preferred some thorough and de novo legislation, with a presence of simplicity and absence of confusion, upon this subject—some bill independent of any reference to the act of 1883, or the "Morrill tariff" of 1861, and not requiring a tedious investigation and laborious analysis of past enactments in order to ascertain the duties to be imposed on and after the 1st of July, 1884. The country demands and expects of the majority in this House the inauguration of some measure of substantial reform, and the faith of the Democratic party is pledged to relieve the people. To fully execute this purpose there must be excluded from consideration every thought of protection to particular persons or special localities, and the question must be viewed supremely from a national standpoint. If one industry is to be specially fostered, all others can with equal propriety demand protection. If one Representative insists upon public bounty for a special interest in his district, he opens the door for a general application; and such a course will but perpetuate existing conditions. While I have neither the time nor the ability to properly discuss the entire bill, still I feel specially called upon to announce my position upon one of its features, and I desire to do so in a plain and unmistakable manner. The people whom I have the honor to represent are entitled to know my views, and the right and duty are with me to define myself before them and the country.

I am a humble representative, in part, of the greatest wool-producing State in the American Union, and come directly from a district which contains more sheep, I assume, than any other in the United States. The increase of this industry in Texas, even during the last year, is truly remarkable. On the 1st of January, 1883, as shown by assessment-rolls, the number of sheep rendered for taxes in my State was 4,491,600. The February report for the present year from the division of statistics of the Department of Agriculture places the estimated number in January, 1884, at 7,956,295; more than 1,000,000 in excess of that of any other State or Territory. The same estimate puts the aggregate number in all the States and Territories at 50,626,626, giving to Texas more than one-seventh of the total.

I may fail to convince the opposition, and may not satisfy the sheepmen of the country, that the proposed reduction in the tariff on wool will not injuriously affect the wool business; that it will not measurably embarrass that interest and depress prices. I might content myself by saying—what ought to be a conclusive reason—that it is unjust and unconstitutional to tax the great body of the people to protect that or any other interest; that protection to one sheep-raiser, if it increases the cost of the consumer's necessities, means oppression and injustice to fifty other good citizens engaged in other pursuits, and that the conscientious discharge of apparent duty is infinitely above and beyond any consideration of the mere consequences involved.

But I do not believe, in the presence of living facts and the truth of history, that high tariffs on wools necessarily bring high prices to the wool-grower. I am not prepared to state the exact extent to which the character of wools produced in Texas enters into competition with that imported from foreign countries, but feel warranted in the statement that it is limited.

Mr. HURD, in his recent admirable speech, said:

There are three grades or classes of wool in the market—first, the superfine or the Silesian wool; second, the intermediary or combing wool; and third, the coarse carpet wool. Of these America does not produce the superfine wool or the carpet wool, and it can not produce them. Therefore no duty on them can be of any benefit to the farmer of this country. He does not grow them.

As to the intermediary grade this is the situation: The wools of the foreign countries have a fiber and texture which our wools do not possess, and the American manufacturer needs them to mix with American wool to produce the best results. No man can have a good suit of clothes made from American goods alone. From England, from France, and other parts of the world we want the wool with their fiber to make the best product for our manufacturer in his work of supplying the home demand.

I believe every pound of American wool of intermediary grade that comes into this country will make more valuable every pound of wool raised here. The basis of my proposition on this point is that the foreign wool does not come into America in competition with American wool, but to supplement its deficiencies. This is no idle theory of mine.

As to the general effect of the tariff on the prices of wool in this country I take the liberty to quote in addition the following extract from a very able published letter of Senator J. H. SLATER to the secretary of the wool-growers' convention of Oregon, of date December 30, 1883:

It has been demonstrated over and over again from the statistics of wool prices in this country, covering a period of many years, during which time wool has been subjected to varying duties, sometimes practically prohibitory, at other times letting in the lower grades entirely free, with a moderate duty upon the higher and firmer grades, that the domestic product has always borne better prices under low tariffs or when wool was free than during periods of high duties. This fact has been reiterated in this country and elsewhere many times by publicists of the highest character.

In corroboration of this statement I invite attention to the following quotations from the forcible speech of Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER in the last Congress:

In 1867 the wool-growers of the country and the manufacturers of woolen goods succeeded in inducing Congress to impose protective duties on the importation of foreign wools, and also to impose such additional duties upon importations of foreign woolen goods as would compensate them for the loss they would sustain by reason of the duties on the raw material. The tariff upon wool prior to 1867 had been fluctuating under various acts of Congress from 1824 to 1865. Some of these acts placed the duties very low. From 1858 to 1861 wool costing 20 cents per pound or less was on the free-list, and all other wools paid a duty of 24 per cent. ad valorem. From 1862 to 1864 the duty on wools costing 18 cents per pound and less was but 5 per cent. ad valorem, and over 18 cents and less than 24 cents it was 3 cents per pound, and over 24 cents per pound in price 9 cents per pound in duty.

Between 1865 and 1866 the tariff on wool costing 12 cents per pound and less was 3 cents per pound, and costing over 12 cents up to 24 cents per pound the duty was 6 cents per pound, and between 24 cents per pound and 32 cents per pound the duty was 10 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem; and on all wools costing over 32 cents per pound the duty was 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. The act of August 22, 1866, slightly changed these duties, but they remained substantially the same until the taking effect of the act of March 2, 1867, the law now in force. I will not recapitulate the various tariffs imposed by the act of 1867. The classification prepared by Government experts embraces one hundred and sixty-eight different standard samples of wool to be taxed under this law. The duties, however, vary from 18 to 110 per cent.

These burdens are very unequally distributed on the different classes of wool, carpet wools being taxed at the rate of from 18 to 39 per cent. ad valorem, while fine wool pays from 37 to 88 per cent. in the grease, and from 31 to 96 per cent. if washed, and from 73 to 110 per cent. if in scoured condition. It will be seen that the high tariff upon fine washed and scoured wools has had a marked effect upon the manufacture of woolen goods in this country, and has worked greatly to the injury of both the wool-growers and manufacturers, as will be seen as I proceed further.

The wool-growers felicitated themselves after the passage of the act of 1867 upon the success which had attended their efforts in securing a protective tariff on their product; but we will see how far their expectations have been realized. Their object in securing tariff legislation was to prevent foreign wools from competing with their products. They desired to practically exclude many classes of wool from our markets in order that they might receive greater prices for all they might raise. I shall be able to prove that, so far from realizing their expectations, the market has actually been depressed; that in the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers the number of sheep has vastly decreased, and that the price of wool has averaged less per pound since the high tariffs were imposed than prevailed previously under low tariffs.

I have stated that since the passage of the protective tariff act of 1867 up to the present time, a period of fifteen years, the price of wool in this country has been less than it was for the fifteen years next preceding that time. This proposition is not left to conjecture or speculation. Fortunately for the position which I assume the most accurate and reliable data upon this subject have been preserved, and herewith I present for careful examination the following statement furnished by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department:

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR.,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
February 3, 1882.

The average price for the fifteen years preceding 1867 was 58.8 cents per pound.
The average price for the fifteen years succeeding 1867 was 48.6 cents per pound.

These statements, supported as they are by facts and figures, are exceedingly cogent and to my mind unanswerable. But be that as it may, with me the solution of the matter, as before intimated, does not depend upon the possible results to one class of business enterprise, but upon doing what is right. I can not, as a public representative, sworn to support the Constitution, seeking general justice, economic administration, and fair dealing to the entire people, ask that wool be protected, if it has to be done at the expense of all other interests, and thereby lay the foundation for the protection of everything else which clamors for class legislation. I consent to and shall vote for the reduction on wool as proposed by the bill under consideration, as well as for all other reductions contemplated, as far as they go, believing that to the extent of such reductions the general well-being of the people will be promoted. But while this is the case I wish to contend that an average reduction of only 19.99 per cent. on wool is not met by an average reduction of 15.06 per cent. on the manufactures of wool, as estimated under this bill.

The following statistical statement, prepared at my request by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, shows the operations of the tariff upon wool and the manufactures thereof, and the relative difference in the results of the old law and the act of March 3, 1883.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Bureau of Statistics, March 7, 1884.

From this it appears that the duty on the character of wools therein stated was decreased, while that upon woolen manufactures was increased as indicated, under the act of the Forty-seventh Congress. The inequality was glaring enough under the old law. The reasonable proportion and adjustment of rates would have demanded under that a very considerable reduction on the manufactures of wool to have equalized them with those upon the raw materials. And now while the present bill limits the maximum rate of duty on wools and woolens at 60 per cent. ad valorem, and is pro tanto a relief to the people, yet I think it preserves and perpetuates, to a greater or less extent, many of the original vices, and in addition provides—

That nothing in this act shall operate to reduce the duty above imposed on any article below the rate at which said article was dutiable under "An act to provide for the payment of outstanding Treasury notes, to authorize a loan, to regulate and fix the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1861, commonly called the "Morrill tariff."

This clause prevents, it is true, a 20 per cent. reduction on some characters of wool, but comes, I think, materially to the aid of certain woolen manufactures, and allows the duties thereon to remain too high. I do not favor any indorsement of the maladjustment or cabalistic features of the existing tariff law. In my judgment the pruning ought to be thorough and the reformation radical. "What is worth doing at all is worth doing well." If existing conditions are condemned, it seems to me that the ax ought to be laid to the root of the tree; if the tares are to be separated from the wheat, why not collect them all, and apply the fire? I believe in an intrepid policy and a heroic treatment of this national disease. If it be wise and proper to agitate the tariff question—and that it is I entertain no doubt—the agitation, it seems to me, should be comprehensive, and the work of reformation extend all along the line.

No skirmishing, no half-way measure, no temporizing expedient will elicit popular commendation or endure the test of enlightened criticism. If the desired and necessary legislation can not be accomplished—and under the present composition of Congress I fear it is hopeless—a courageous assertion of principle, an exhibition of the faith within us can be made. Now, I have no adverse criticism to make upon the pending bill, save the propriety of eliminating therefrom the defects and inequalities which characterize the past enactments; if they are to furnish the model, if it were left to me, I would lop off their excrescences, heal their deformities, and eschew their vices. But if in the judgment of wiser men it be now impracticable to obviate these imperfections, I shall support the bill in its present shape in the interest of harmony and concert of action. For one, I am willing to lay upon the altar of the common country every selfish consideration, and that my people shall rely upon their natural resources, their own protective energies, the legitimate profits of their own pursuits, unaided by any tribute to be extracted at the toil and expense of their fellow-men.

It is neither impolitic nor improper to demand an equivalent concession at the hands of others. The humblest shepherd, who in the solitude of the Western prairies attends his flock and listens to the bleating of his lambs, is the peer of the grandest millionaire in the crowded city, whose music comes from the hum of his spindles and the clang of his machinery. The one is just as good, just as nobly born, just as American, just as much entitled to consideration as the others. Equal rights is the transcript of the paternal mind, planted in the cornerstone of our republican edifice, and when by ruthless hand removed, the stately structure will be in ruins. I would adorn this idea by the splendid language and patriotic sentiment of our distinguished Speaker [Mr. CARLISLE], who, in discussing the Tariff Commission, said:

The unskilled and unpretending laborer who guides the plow and gathers the harvest is as much entitled to the protection of the law and to the encouragement of the Government as the scientific artisan who has mastered all the mysteries of his craft. Each one of the busy millions who helps to create and distribute the varied products of this wonderful land of ours has an undoubted right to demand an equal participation in all the advantages conferred by the laws of his country; and I repudiate every definition of American industry or American labor which excludes a single honest and useful occupation. Whoever challenges the right of the humblest citizen, whatever may be his trade or occupation, to an equal participation in the benefits conferred by the Government so long as he bears an equal share of its burdens, denies the equality of man; whoever asserts that one class of men or one species of industry has a right to exact tribute from another for its own benefit, or has superior claims upon the consideration of the Government, asserts a doctrine utterly at war with the first principles of our political system. To call such a doctrine the "American doctrine," and to announce it in high-sounding and patriotic phrase, is simply an attempt to hide its deformity beneath a rhetorical and sentimental garb, and will deceive no one who looks beyond the surface.

These living words and imperishable truths will forever do credit to the heart that conceived and the tongue that uttered them. Far be it from me, while candor compels these suggestions of imperfections, to interpose, if I could, the slightest obstruction to the passage of this bill. If nothing more can be accomplished, I hail it as a partial relief, and give it welcome, as the beginning of a great and glorious work, whose consummation is supremely desired, and will result, when selfish motives and sectional partisanship shall be absorbed by American patriotism—when the devoted servant and faithful lover of his country shall rank higher in political excellence than the mere Democrat or the Republican.

Upon this great question, in conclusion, I beg to express the conviction that here is the battle-ground; on this field victory is to be won, or from this contest will come defeat, disastrous and terrific. This issue minifies all others; upon none else can the great combat be successfully waged. The Constitution is with us; the justice of the case is with us; the hopes of the future are with us; our day and generation demand an unfaltering consecration to the work before us. May we "quit ourselves like men," as the representatives of the great party of the people, and ultimately furl our flags in the federation of mankind, the universal brotherhood of a common citizenship.

Mr. DOCKERY addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, to argue this question correctly we must consider all the avenues whence revenue flows into the bosom of our Government, where it comes from, and to what branches the pruning-knife should be put.

TAXATION.

Taxation is a question in which every citizen should feel the deepest and most vital interest. The Constitution of the United States, section 8, declares:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

So the United States Government has three general ways by which it can support itself. It may do so by all three, any two, or one.

There are some incidental revenues collected; some are collected from the sale of public lands. In the origin the General Government owned no public lands, they all belonged to the States, but soon after the adoption of the Constitution many of the States ceded a part of their territory to the United States, to wit:

	Acres.
New York and Massachusetts	202,187
Virginia (exclusive of Kentucky)	165,659,680
South Carolina	3,136,000
Georgia	56,680,930
North Carolina	29,184,000
Connecticut	4,300,000
Total	259,171,797
Louisiana purchase	756,961,280
Florida purchase	37,931,520
Mexican treaty	336,443,520
Purchase from Texas	65,130,880
Gadsden purchase	29,142,400
Alaska	369,529,600
	1,823,180,387

HOW DISPOSED OF.

Sold	200,000,000
Given to States as swamp lands	70,000,000
Given to States for internal improvements	8,000,000
Given to States as salt springs	1,000,000
Given to States of Florida, Oregon, and New Mexico	3,000,000
Given to States for schools and colleges	79,000,000
Land bounties for military and naval services	61,000,000
Homesteads	56,000,000
Timber culture	10,000,000
Canals and wagon-roads	6,000,000
Desert-land act	1,000,000
Given to States for railroads	36,000,000
Patented to railroad corporations	11,000,000
Total	542,000,000

Besides, the estimate of the Land Office is that it will require 125,000,000 acres to satisfy the claims of the corporations, and these claims are based upon grants demanding work to be done that has not been done; hence, as these lands have not been earned they should revert to the United States.

Besides the above there have been in small bodies 6,000,000 acres disposed of, leaving now undisposed of 1,273,946,438 acres.

The above policy has in many particulars been wrong. More especially, as our Government now exists, there should be no more ceding of land to States, no more patents or gifts to railroads or any other corporations, but sales to private settlers in such way as will not foster monopolies or create landlords, and the money arising therefrom used in the payment of the public debt and supporting the Government.

THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

In the origin this Department was small, only about five hundred offices; but it has kept pace with the growth of the Government until now it extends all over the United States, there being in round numbers nearly 48,000 offices; of miles, 110,208 by railroads, 16,093 by steamboats, and 226,865 star-route service, being a grand total of 353,166 miles. This is a very important Department of the Government; through it friends can communicate with each other though they live thousands of miles apart, each knowing how the other is succeeding in life.

The Government issues the stamps and places them on sale in the various post-offices throughout the country; the people buy and pay money for them; they are placed on the various mail matter, which is put in the post-office, where the stamps are canceled and the mail sent to its place of destination, though the distance may be thousands of miles. Anywhere within the limits of this great Government 2 cents will carry an ordinary letter, while if a private person was hired to do this it would cost some $200 or more. This Department costs some $42,000,000 annually, and has been made self-sustaining; but whether it will be under the law of 2-cent stamps or not I do not know. With the same amount of mail heretofore transported it will fall short some $10,000,000 or $12,000,000. This Department should be made self-sustaining, because—

First. Carrying the mail is a contract between the Government and each citizen sending mail. The citizen pays the Government to carry his mail and the Government carries it for pay. Each should pay for the labor the Government performs for him. The great masses of the people, the laboring classes, the toiling millions, send but little mail; only a few letters a year. It is the bondholders, bankers, railroaders, manufacturers, merchants, newspaper men, and lawyers that send the great bulk of the mail in business transactions, that receive the great labor of the Government; hence they should pay for it. It is wrong to tax one class to forward the business of another, or to impoverish one to enrich the other.

Second. This tax is the easiest and cheapest to collect of all taxes—no tax-assessor, no tax-collector; the money is paid into the bosom of the Government without expense or cost.

Third. It is a national tax; it comes from every part of the Government wherever there is a post-office, and in proportion to the benefits received.

Fourth. The stamp is equivalent to the money issues of the Government, bottomed upon its faith, is paid for in labor, taken up, and canceled.

Fifth. Each citizen gets an equivalent in labor for the money paid the Government.

DIRECT TAXES.

As said before, there are three general ways by which the Government can support itself. I will discuss each of these in their proper order.

First. Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes. The word "taxes" usually embraces both direct and indirect taxes, but as used here it was only intended to embrace direct taxes. To strengthen this view, in the latter part of the section under consideration the manner of laying and collecting indirect taxes is fixed, but the word "taxes" is dropped, for that paragraph reads thus:

All duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Certainly it could not have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution to leave Congress with unlimited power over taxes and the property of the people, for there is no other clause or section in the Constitution that fixes the manner of laying and collecting taxes; there are two sections fixing the manner of levying and collecting direct taxes. Section 2, "Representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers," &c.; "the other section, 9, "No capitation or other direct taxes shall be levied except in accordance with the next previous census." Now, "if taxes," as used in the section under consideration, does not mean direct taxes, Congress would be in this dilemma: they would have the power to lay and collect taxes, but the manner of laying and collecting would not be fixed; while the manner of laying and collecting direct taxes would be fixed, the power to lay and collect would not be fixed. It would be next to absurdity to suppose the framers of our Constitution would commit such a blunder as this. The reasonable conclusion then is, as heretofore stated, that taxes must mean direct taxes.

Direct taxes are taxes upon land and the poll, and were intended by the framers of our Constitution to be levied only in cases of war, where necessity demanded it. This has been the understanding of every Congress that has met since the adoption of the Constitution, for we find only two or three epochs in the history of our Government where they have been laid and collected, one immediately after the war of 1812, another during and since our late war. Besides, it is not within the power of mortal brain to make this tax equal, for it is apportioned according to population. To illustrate: here are two States, one a small State, but densely populated, poor lands, the people nearly all engaged in manufacturing; the other a large State, four times the size of the small one, rich and productive lands, sparsely populated, its population only equal to that of the small one, and lands worth four times as much per acre. Here one State would pay sixteen times as much according to the value of its lands as the other, and even in this the lands belonging to church corporations, charitable institutions, benevolent societies, school corporations, and cemeteries must be free, constituting about one-third in value of all the State's lands. This is only one species of property; belongs to one class of our people; is the basis of all wealth, foundation, groundwork, and mudsills of the continuity of human and animal existence. From it all wealth is acquired. It is the gift of our Heavenly Father to the human family without price; it is taxed by the States, counties, and corporations. Therefore the burdens of the taxes of the General Government should be removed from it.

POLL-TAX.

It is argued, let the tax go upon the poll; that will make it equal. It is the equality of this that makes it odious. The poll is taxed by the States, counties, and corporations; to put the United States tax upon the poll the poor would have as much to pay as the rich. Our Government promises every citizen protection in life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness. Experience demonstrates that property causes nine-tenths of the legislation and expenses of the Government in making and enforcing laws to protect it. Why should it not pay for these expenses? Besides, the rich float in seas of luxury, dine at their sumptuous tables, lull in their golden parlors, and sail in their silvery chariots; own the great bulk of property, their broad domains dotted with sheep, hogs, cattle, horses, and mules. They own the railroads, turnpikes, manufacturing establishments, and banks. In a word, all the wealth of the world may be counted as belonging to that class. The law throws its strong arm around and over all this property and shields it from invasions from abroad or trespass at home.

The double-breasted, brawny-armed, and horny-handed laborer comes to the rescue of the law, breasts the bullets, drives back the invading foe and quells an insurrection, thereby securing the property of the rich. Land is the cream and labor the machinery that converts it into butter. The toiling millions in the interior of our country, pursuing the varied avocations of life, adapt everything to the wants, necessities, and desires of human life. They build the railroads, turnpikes, plank-roads; open the gold and silver veins of the earth; the coal, iron, and marble arteries of the blue-capped mountains and rock-ribbed ridges are by their strength brought forth and laden the avenues of commerce.

They began in the origin with the Indian trails, converted them into dirt-roads, turnpikes, and railroads with their mighty engines, rolling up millions for transportation, to satiate hunger, obliterate famines, and feed the starving world. They clear the land, build fences, rear houses, and cultivate farms, bring forth from the sunny South its great mountains of cotton, from the great West its countless millions of agricultural products, from the East its grand machinery to take the place of manual labor, and by the goodness of God enrich the world, as it rolls on, in the great increase of population.

These are the very pillars of society; upon their shoulders rest the human family; and domestic animal creation is upheld like driftwood upon the bosom of the waters moving down the great ocean of time to the abyss of eternity.

God gives us the material; labor molds it; here centers all wealth; from the beginning it was decreed that man should eat bread by the sweat of his brow. It is pursuing this law that causes nations to flourish and lands to flow with milk and honey; let the aqueducts of nature be opened, the arms of labor unchained, by removing the taxes of the General Government as far as practicable from both, that they be not shorn of their strength, but, Samson-like, go to the seat of wealth, open the treasures of the earth, and pour them into the avenues of commerce till all are filled to overflowing; then the bloom of health will swell in our national cheeks.

EXCISE TAXES.

This is a tax on all privileges and internal property, save land. This, too, was intended by the framers of our Constitution as a war tax, or tax of necessity. Here the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution is plainly presented. They were seeking to make a perpetual government, and at the same time to support the General Government upon something that did not support the States, counties, and corporations. They looked out on the broad bosom of the ocean and saw three-fourths of the surface of the earth was covered with water. They saw the mighty naval power of Great Britain, France, Spain, and many other foreign nations. They saw that in war a nation was in labor, and that it required much more to feed a nation in labor than one at rest; that two mighty nations at war would send forth their herculean armadas to plow the ocean's bosom till the waters thereof would grow angry and foam in madness; that commerce would be driven from the lines of both, and on the outskirts pirates would play upon it until so crippled that the nation must perish of sheer hunger unless there was some other source of revenue beside imposts. They therefore conferred the power upon Congress to lay and collect internal revenue, in order that the life of the nation might be preserved and the revenue laws enforced. This view is strengthened when we see every Congress since the adoption of the Constitution has so understood it, for we find only three epochs in the history of our Government when this tax has been laid and collected: one after the Revolutionary war up to 1802; one immediately after and during the war of 1812, and one during and since our late war, showing conclusively that in time of peace our Government has been supported by import duties.

But suppose internal revenues are to be levied and collected, upon what shall they be levied? Shall it be upon privileges? What privileges? The privilege of selling whisky, brandies, wines, beer, sale of tobacco, sale of merchandise generally, theaters, opera-houses, circuses, menageries, hotels, boarding-houses, &c. The above are taxed by the States, counties, corporations; they are pursuits followed for a livelihood. But it is said these are evil occupations; sow tares and thistles in our midst—crime generators. This certainly can not be true so far as selling tobacco, merchandise, keeping hotels and boarding-houses are concerned. These are laudable occupations and pursuits of necessity. But suppose the sale of whisky, brandy, wines, beer, &c., is evil. The Government is particeps criminis; it grants the license, receives a part that is made.

If this is an evil, and corrupting the morals of our country, the Government should, with its strong arm and giant body, go to the root of the evil and tear it out. That evil may be removed, but this is a question pertaining to the States, as the power is only conferred on the General Government to lay and collect excises (or internal taxes), and not to abolish or destroy property or privileges allowed by the States not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States or States thereof. Shall this tax be levied upon property? What property is there to levy it on? To levy it upon cotton would be sectional. It is only grown in eight or ten States as a general product. To require these States to support the General Government would be a violation of our Constitution.

It was this principle that brought about the Revolution. England claimed that the colonies were her children; she had rocked them in their cradles, gave them nourishment from her breast, protected and defended them in childhood, and consequently they should assist in paying governmental expenses. The colonies admitted they were the children of England, that she had protected them, but claimed that they were entitled to the same privileges as other English subjects. All of her other children had representation in Parliament, in the House of Commons; they had none. If England would give them representation in that body, as was allowed her other children, they were willing to be taxed; otherwise they were not. England replied: "You are my children and have no right to dictate terms. You are spoiled. I will give you the lash."

The Colonies replied: "We will fight. Give us liberty or give us death." Hence arose the dark and dense clouds of war, marching to the beat of the low-muttering thunder and the light of the vivid lightning, and for seven long and weary years the national heavens opened its flood-gates and sprinkled blood over our noble land; at the end of which time the clouds passed away. Liberty was born. The beautiful political heavens smiled with thirteen little satellites fixed in the vaulted sky. The lovely babe perched upon the nation's brow, dressed in swadling-clothes, the child of the finest pedigree of the known world save our Lord and Saviour, its father's brave blood, its mother's hard toil. How we should admire and love our predecessor's child; now grown to manhood, holding the scepter of equality, maintaining that all were born free and equal politically; now straining the nerves of 50,000,000 people to maintain its purity in its pristine state, wafted by the sea, ocean, and gulf; wings rustling upon their borders, and sending the sweet zephyrs to the interior of all the United States of America.

Shall we put this tax on railroads and manufacturing corporations? They are taxed by the States, counties, and corporations. They are pursuits for a livelihood, followed only by a portion of our people, and are necessary for the development and prosperity of our great and glorious land. It is true this would be more national than upon cotton, for these are not sectional—they extend to all parts of the United States. Still they are certain species of property, and belong to classes of our community; and not to tax them by the General Government would give the States a better chance to support themselves and let Congress have full power to control interstate commerce.

Again, shall this tax be put upon the products of the soil, such as wheat, corn, tobacco, &c.? These are but the children of land and labor, and when the father and mother is not taxed, the children should not be. To tax the children would be to burden the parent and choke the strength of nature; it is this that gives sustenance and continued vitality to the human family and animal creation. Let nature be developed; let the arm that develops her be free and untrameled. It is this that causes nations to grow rich, its seas to float in luxury. It is this that fills the avenues of commerce and breads the starving world; that lulls the children to sleep and chants the laugh of happiness from their parents. It is this that cements the affection of the people to the Government, and makes them glory in its prosperity; that drives from it the winged imps of hell and lets shine the golden rays of heaven. Why should we choke the aqueducts, sewers, and avenues of the earth from whence all wealth flows, and leave grim death to perch upon our nation's face, chain labor, impoverish commerce, and let poverty swing at every door?

I am opposed to any United States tax upon the products of the soil in the hands of the producer, or in the hands of his immediate vendee. Remove it as far as possible from both land and labor that the treasures of the earth may be disemboweled and the thoroughfares of commerce be filled to overflowing. The toiling millions have groaned under the leaden weight of taxes till they have become weak; bond-ridden, bank-ridden, tax-ridden, and poverty-stricken, till they are crying out, "We are heavy-laden and need rest." Lift the hand of liberty, and wave the flag of peace and plenty, that the gentle zephyrs may be found in every cottage-door, hatred driven from the heart of the nation, and love plant its staff to its very core.

If we have an excise (internal-revenue tax) it should be on incomes, under a well-regulated and graduated system, and the sales of whisky, brandy, wine, and beer, under a well-regulated license system; and if upon tobacco, it should be in its manufactured state, beyond the hands of the producer or his immediate vendees.

Income is the child of capital. Our Government promises us protection in life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness. Experience demonstrates that nine-tenths of legislation and expenses of government are incurred in the making and enforcing laws to protect property. Then why should not property pay this expense?

The strong arm of the law is thrown around property, and when invaded by a foreign foe or inland enemy the laborer is called out to maintain the law, drive back the invader or quell an insurrection, that the law may be maintained and property preserved. Besides, this would be a national tax; it would come from every part of the Government and from every occupation, and easily paid—only a small part of man's growing wealth. It may be argued that this is a tax upon industry. So it is, and every tax is a tax upon industry, for all taxes are paid with money, and money can only be obtained through industry.

The difference is, income trickles down the sides of capital like globules of water down the mountains till it strikes branches, creeks, rivers, and finally lodges in the great ocean of wealth, while the muscle of the laborer's arm is his only capital and the use of it his only income; besides, it is his bread, his life-preserver, and earned by the sweat of his face. Put this tax upon labor or the products of the soil and you tax the bread his family eat to satiate their hunger, and leave them, Lazarus-like, lying at the gate of the rich, crying for the crumbs that fall from their tables. You put a millstone to his neck to drag through the weary paths of life, and thus choke the avenues of wealth in all their variations.

THE INTERNAL-REVENUE SYSTEM.

This system is odious to the people, and the manner in which it is carried on shocks human justice. Direct taxes were assessed against the States and once collected by State officers and turned over to the General Government, but not so with internal revenue. Under our present system it is collected by officers of the United States. The President appoints them, the Senate confirms the appointments, and they are sent out all over the United States, several thousand, to do the President's bidding and electioneer for him. They travel armed and equipped, and with armed escorts travel through the country, to the terror of all good and law-abiding citizens; arrest men upon mere suspicion, and often create this suspicion, and upon the most trivial, ignorant, and unintentional violation of the laws. For instance, for the sale of a leaf or two of tobacco grown upon their own land, rather than put their neighbors to the trouble of riding five or six miles to some cross-road store to buy it, they are carried sometimes two or three hundred miles from home to be tried by a judge not of their land and a jury not of their peers, frequently prejudiced against the accused.

It is often the case that the prisoner is poor and his witnesses poor, so that he is not able to bear their expenses in going to court; hence the prisoner is caught a long way from home without money, friends, or proof. He looks through the microscope of the future and sees the scales of justice are against him and the dark doors of a dungeon parting for his admittance into prison as a convict. There is no escape; so he pleads guilty, though innocent of any heinous crime. If only fined, he is not able to pay it; hence a felon's cell is his fate. He feels degraded, and when he finds himself incarcerated within the walls of a prison with thieves, robbers, and murderers, animosity swells in his bosom against a government that would so unjustly and cruelly degrade him in his own estimation and that of his friends and a government that has become the instrument of inhumanity and cruelty; consequently the Government is thrown into disrepute and hatred by its own citizens all over the country.

This is not the worst. These officers are proud of their existence. They think the Government demands much of them, that they will be sustained in whatsoever they may do. So they go forth, confiscate property of citizens on their own ipse dixit, without judge or jury, a power higher than the President, supreme judges, or Congress, even kings, a monstrosity in a republican form of government, unknown to the Magna Charta, constitution, or laws of civilized nations. But it is said the party has a remedy where he is too poor to fight the Government, employ counsel, and undergo a long suit with all prejudices against him. So he is bound to submit quietly to these appalling and unprecedented outrages.

But suppose the citizen should imagine himself in a free country and should resist these unlawful aggressions; the least resistance subjects him to being murdered on the spot. The State feels aggrieved; her laws have been invaded, her dignity insulted; she promised her citizens protection in life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness; here one of them has been murdered, so she takes hold of the murderer to avenge the wrong done. Ah! the United States can not bear this; she must come with her giant arms and colossal body and protect the accused, tear him loose from the State courts, carry him to the bosom of the Federal court to be tried, where judge, jury, prosecuting attorney, and marshal are all favorably inclined to the prisoner, believing it for the protection of the Federal law; the trial comes on, the district attorney presses it forward, the marshal summons a few witnesses, who may know but little about the case; he can not find the witnesses, because there is no one to inform him of those who know all about the case, though they may be a hundred miles nearer than the ones he summoned.

So the case is thus put to the jury, and the accused is liberated, a verdict being brought in of not guilty. He returns to where the crime was committed, the citizens see him at liberty, pronounced not guilty by a jury; they realize the fact that their neighbor is locked in the icy hands of death; their hearts swell, their veins pulsate to see the law thus administered, the young blood swells to overflowing, they take the law into their own hands, ambush the murderer, and shoot him down. So one murder begets another. Like the tyrannical tax-gatherers of Rome (the publicans), they became so odious to the people that citizens waylaid them on the roads and shot them down for their own safety.

Think for one moment. Suppose the President, any of his Cabinet, Supreme Judge, Senator, or Representative in Congress were to go to any State and commit a like crime, he would be tried by the State courts and punished for the crime. Go even further. Suppose the Czar of Russia, or any other foreign ruler, should come to any State of this Union and commit a like crime, they would be tried and punished by the State courts and laws. Then why have these revenue agents grown so great; upon what meats have they fed? Are they superior to queens, czars, emperors, presidents, judges, and senators? Whence came the wind that blew them so much power? Are they of nobler birth, superior in blood, born of better parents, nursed at purer breasts than all the balance of the people? Are they the elect to rule and inhabit the political heavens? It is not the individual officer under this system so much to be condemned as the law—the system itself. It places the officers where their desire is extreme to fulfill their duty, to do which their acts must be arbitrary and more military than civil; hence the Government feels duty bound to shield its actors in the claimed execution of its arbitrary laws.

Ah! it is the United States Government with her giant arms and massive body raising the huge dagger of consolidation, sending it quivering to the hearts of States' rights and shedding their life-blood upon their own ruin. This is but the shadow, the forerunner of the coming storm; we must recede or liberty, our noble son, like the dying swan that never utters a syllable till death's ruthless arrow has pierced his breast, will sing his farewell song as he passes into the arms of grim death. Have we no remedy? I answer, we have. One is to abolish the internal-revenue tax entirely; the other is to gradually retire and reform it and place it upon such articles as is easiest borne, that will require the fewest officers, as heretofore set forth, and thus get rid of the horde of officers and storekeepers now preying upon the people.

If placed upon incomes and the sales of whisky, brandy, wine, beer, &c., it seems to me that the Government, with one commissioner in each State, could have these taxes assessed and collected by State officers and paid over to said commissioners, and when one of these officers violates the law let him be amenable to the State laws, tried where the crime is committed and by the authority of those whose laws have been violated. This would inaugurate a system of impartial trials, and teach the citizen that he is as much respected in his place as the officer is in his, generate love between the officer and citizen, dismiss some 6,000 blood-suckers, and lift from the shoulders of the people some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 annually above all expense of collecting; it would restore our choked liberties to the bloom of health and aid to perpetuate our Republic.

IMPOSTS AND DUTIES.

These relate to taxes alone upon imports. As it is seen, the Constitution forbids taxes upon exports except to pay inspection fees. The object of this was to encourage home industry and production; but what is the effect? If the producer raises anything for foreign markets and ships abroad himself, the foreign merchant knows what it cost to raise and ship it and what tariff, if any, is put upon it; hence he only pays cost and carriage. Our home merchants can by contract ship cheaper than the producer; so when the producer sells to merchants at home they buy everything upon shipping prices, deducting the price it costs the producer to ship, and tariff, if any; hence does not ship one-fourth abroad. Thus the home and foreign markets are supplied.

So it is seen the producer sells in the lowest market in the world, but the rule shifts when he comes to buy. All articles shipped from foreign markets here, first, have the cost of making; second, cost of shipping; third, the duty and imposts or tariff—all of which must be paid by the foreign merchant before he can sell here. So our merchant must pay this, and when he sells to consumers must charge it. When our manufacturers sell to our merchants they exact the same price as the foreign merchant, getting the benefit of both the shipping and tariff. So when the merchant sells to consumers he must add all of this to his sales; hence the consumers buy in the highest market in the world. True, the tariff has some good and some bad features.

In the first place it seems to have been the intention of the framers of our Constitution that the Government of the United States should be supported in times of peace upon something not taxed by the States, counties, or corporations thereof. And impost is the only thing under our Constitution they can not tax (except probably United States bank notes, bonds, and property, &c.); and this seems to have been verified by every Congress that has met since the adoption of the Constitution, for there have been fifty-three years in the history of our Government when the tax on imports alone supported the Government (except incidental taxes), from 1802 to 1813, from 1820 to 1861, and at all other times there has been a tariff duty imposed. Besides, a tax upon imports is national, and comes from every consumer in proportion to what he consumes, all over the United States, and is a tax the least known of any as it is indirect. Not one out of twenty knows when he pays it. In 1791, under Washington's administration, the United States debt was $75,463,476; from this time until 1801 it gradually increased until it was $82,976,204—a period of ten years.

In 1801 the debt was $83,038,050. During the aforesaid ten years the excise tax was in existence. From 1801 to 1813, under Democratic administrations, said debt gradually decreased to $45,120,150, including the purchase of Louisiana at $15,000,000; outside of this it would have been $30,000,000. In 1802, under Jefferson's administration, the excise tax was repealed on stilled and distilled spirits, on refined sugar, on license to retail dealers, on pleasure carriages, and on stamps, and in 1799 direct taxes were repealed, during which twelve years the people prospered more than ever before.

In 1813 direct taxes were again levied and collected. While the debt was $78,408,669 in 1799 it was only $55,962,827 in 1813. In 1816 direct taxes were again repealed partially, and gradually down to 1818, when the above debt was $103,466,633. From 1820 to 1861 there was no direct or excise tax, and the debt gradually diminished till 1860, when it was $64,769,703. So the prosperous years of our Government has been from 1801 to 1813, and from 1820 to 1861, when there was neither direct nor excise tax. For these fifty-two years the Government was supported upon imposts and duty taxes only as a general tax, and for forty-one years of adversity it has had direct, excise, and impost-duty taxes, with the tariff high. Twenty-three years of this time has been during and since our late war, and only nineteen before.

Does this not clearly demonstrate that when all three of these taxes are in existence, the increase of officers and burdens of collection is trebbled upon the public, thereby burdening them with leaden weight till storms of adversity sweep down upon the whole country like an avalanche from the mountain-sides. In proportion as you burden the people with Government officers and taxes, in that proportion you lessen their ability to support States, counties, corporations, churches, schools, and to feed and clothe themselves and those depending upon them. We must remember the taxes that support the General Government come off of the same people that support States, counties, corporations, churches, and schools.

High and numerous taxes mean heavy and uncalled-for oppression, adversity, paupers, slaves, and serfs on the one side, and lords, nabobs, and monopolies on the other, while low taxes equally laid and collected from one common source means prosperity and equality and general protection under the law, the destruction of lords, nabobs, monopolies, and masters, and a general diffusion of freedom and liberty to all. But the bad feature is the great cost of collection. Statistics show that one-fifth only of our consumption is imported from abroad and four-fifths manufactured at home. Of this one-fifth the taxes collected under the tariff are over $200,000,000 annually; so while this sum goes into the Treasury, four times that much goes into the coffers of the manufacturers, making $800,000,000. Thus it takes $1,000,000,000 out of the hands of the consumers to get into the Treasury $200,000,000.

Here the great difference arises between the political parties that have existed since the foundation of our Government. One party has contended that Congress has the power to lay and collect imposts and duties for protection; that is, protection is to be the primary object, the leading object, the kite, and revenue the tail; while the other party has contended that revenue must be the primary object, the leading object, the kite, and protection the tail. These parties have assumed such proportions in times of political excitement that the Government would tremble from center to circumference like the upheaving banks of a belching volcano.

This difference originated in the formation of the Government. One party contended that as much power as possible should be conferred upon the General Government, and as little as possible retained by the States; while the other contended that as little as possible should be given the General Government, and as much as possible retained in the States. So, upon the adoption of the Constitution, each party assumed its construction of it, one claiming that it should have a broad, liberal, and latitudinarian construction; that it was the intention of the framers to give as much power as possible to the General Government under the language used; every intendment and resolution should favor the conveyance of a power; every doubt should go to the Government; hence every power should be considered conveyed, expressly conveyed, every implied or incidental power necessary to carry into effect the express ones, and every implied power related to or connected with an express or a necessary implied one.

While the other party contended that the Constitution should have a strict and literal construction, and was so intended by the framers, they were taking power from thirteen sovereigns and giving it to one. Wherever they intended a power should be conveyed they said so in so many words. The fact that they have not said so is a resolution against the conveyance of the power. If they had intended to have conveyed it, how easy it was at the time to have said so. Every doubt should favor the retention of power in the States. The General Government is one of delegated powers; the powers not delegated are retained. Therefore the General Government should have only such powers as are expressly delegated and such implied powers as are absolutely necessary to carry into effect the expressed ones, and none others; never exercise an original implied power or any power merely because it was related to an expressed or necessarily implied power.

The Democratic party from the foundation of the Government maintained the latter construction, while all other parties that have sprung up like mushrooms and died out have maintained the former construction. From the views heretofore enunciated have arisen the difference between the political parties on the clause of the Constitution now under consideration. The clause read thus:

> Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The broad constructionist contends that this section confers upon Congress two separate powers: one to lay and collect taxes, impost duties and excises, the other to pay the debts, provide for the common defense and general welfare; hence Congress has unlimited power over both of these. Their will is the law; their conscience, their discretion, the only boundary line. Their power over taxation and the general welfare is as boundless as the vaulted heavens. There is no power on earth to limit it. Hence the section should read thus: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, and also the power to pay the debts, provide for the common defense and general welfare."

The strict constructionist contended that these paragraphs only conveyed one power. One of them conveyed a power, the other limited the power conveyed. If this be not true there would be no need of any other clause in the Constitution conferring any power on Congress, for unlimited power is already conferred; the balance of the power conferred would be but a rehearsal of what had already been done; besides, it never was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to give Congress unlimited power over the property of the States and people. This would be taking the sovereignty of the States and people and vesting it in Congress; hence creating an aristocracy with unlimited sovereign power. Therefore this section should read thus: "Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, for the purpose of paying the debts, providing for the common defense, and general welfare," &c.; hence the necessity for and reason why other clauses follow this, conveying other and separate powers.

Now, let us test these constructions. If the former be true, then the will of Congress is the law of taxation, and they can lay and collect taxes for whatever purpose they choose. Their conscience is their only limit. If they willed to do so, they could lay and collect taxes to build railroads, plank-roads, turnpikes, churches, school-houses, manufacturing establishments, establish banks, build mills, cut canals, keep in operation all of the above things, buy land, and in a word for any and all purposes they willed; thereby float every vestige of property from the States and people into the bosom of the United States; hence destroy the States and reduce the people to serfdom. So the idea that this is an indestructible union of indestructible States is a mere farce, for Congress would have the power to destroy the States.

Each member of Congress would have as much power as the Czar of Russia and could sway the scepter as arbitrarily. Hence instead of having one tyrant we would have three hundred and twenty-five in the House and seventy-six in the Senate, increasing tyranny four hundred and one fold. It would be like turning so many wolves loose amid a flock of lambs; the earth would grow sick with blood and pine for law and order. Each Congressman would have his political and personal enemies and their friends would flock to their aid for the spoils, four hundred and one armies marching in our midst. This once happy land, land of liberty, the asylum of the oppressed world, the land of civil and religious liberty, the land of peace and plenty, the recognized friend of the world, approaching nearest the attributes of heaven, the model of modern governments, with earth's noblest gems, where freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religious worship, freedom of office, freedom of the ballot-box, and political equality are recognized as its grand and leading attributes, would be converted into a land of misrule and bloodshed, anarchy, and tyranny; a land of vipers, with their forked tongues poisoning the very air we inhale at every breath.

Such is certainly contrary to the intention of our constitutional framers and foreign to a republic. I will lay down a rule of construction that is a rule of reason and common sense, to wit: If the framers of the Constitution intended to make a republican form of government and used language of double meaning, it should have that construction that would make it a republic; but if they intended to make it a monarchical form of government and used language of doubtful meaning, we should give it the construction to make it a monarchy. Now, who can doubt the soundness of this rule? Reason drives all opposition before it like the golden rays of the morning sun drives away the mists. Apply this rule and we must be convinced beyond all doubt that Congress has not unlimited power over taxation, but only the power to lay and collect for the purpose of paying the debts, providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, and for no other purpose. This view is strengthened and conclusively proved by the very nature of our Government.

The Government promises each citizen protection in life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness. Which means equal protection to all, poor as well as rich, weak as well as strong, low as well as high, old as well as young, idiot as well as giant. While the citizen promises the Government to fight for it in war, and support it in war and peace, these promises are mutual, and the Government is as much bound to fulfill its part of the contract as the citizen is his. The Government can not sacrifice the life of one man for the benefit of another, but only for its own protection. So the same with liberty and property.

If one man takes the property of another and converts the same to his own use, the Government when appealed to must compel the restoration of the property or its equivalent. So the Government has no more right to take the property of one man and give it to another, than the man has himself, for this would be destroying the property of one and enhancing that of another, which would be class legislation, and enable Congress to make lords and nabobs of one class, and serfs, paupers, hewers of wood and drawers of water of the other. This same principle of protection applies to partnerships, classes, corporations, and industries. On the other hand the citizen promises the Government to fight for it; hence the Government can not call upon one man to fight for another, or one society or corporation to fight for another, but for the Government alone; and the Government must quell insurrections, punish affrays, assaults, and batteries.

Again, the Government can not call upon one man, society, corporation, class, or industry to support another. The citizen only promised the Government to support it, and the Government can only call upon the citizen to support it. This is the full extent of the promise of the citizen to the Government, and the Government has no right to call upon him for any more. By parity of reasoning, then, Congress has no right to tax one industry to support another; so a tariff the primary object of which is protection is both unconstitutional and contrary to the nature and fundamental principles of our Government. The powers of taxation are all embraced in the same section of the Constitution, to wit: Congress has power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, duties and excises, &c. So the same power exists in Congress to lay and collect taxes and excises that does to lay and collect imposts and duties, and if Congress has the power to lay and collect imposts and duties for protection, they have the equal power to lay and collect taxes and excises for the same purpose. Hence the poll and lands could be taxed for the protection of manufacturing establishments; so could privileges and all internal property; hence the very basis, foundation, and nature of our Government would be perverted. Equality and liberty would cease.

If by nature manufacturing establishments can not maintain themselves, then it would be impoverishing nature to tax other industries to sustain them, and in proportion as nature's laws are violated we grow weak, impoverish our country, and make pygmies of our people. Everything was intended to follow natural laws in order to give it the greatest strength. If a country is by nature an agricultural one, let its primary object be agriculture. If commercial, let its leading object be commerce. If manufacturing, let its main object be manufactures. If all these be equal, let each stand upon its own natural facilities, and each maintain itself without burdening the other; let not one be burdened to support the other, for in that proportion you weaken all. If there was a reason to tax other industries to support manufactures that reason no longer exists, and it is a maxim that when a reason for a law ceases the law ceases.

There might have been a time in the infancy of this Government when protection was needed. In the origin of this Government there were only thirteen States, containing an area of 350,000 square miles, sparsely settled. The howl of the cougar, growl of the bear, and war-whoop of the savage commingled and echoed amid the tall cane waved by the gentle sea zephyrs. There were no railroads, no turnpikes, no inland navigation, only about 3,000,000 inhabitants, about five hundred post-offices, and about $2,000,000 worth of property. The muskets had just been stacked, cannons muzzled, and swords sheathed. True, the dark clouds of war had passed away, and the gentle breezes of freedom were fanned through the interior by the rustling of the sea wings. Still, the footprints of its sad effects were visible at every door. We were met with the horrible sight of a widow with five or six children clinging to her apron-strings, with a one-legged or one-armed man or a wrecked body upon some cottage bed.

It required every able-bodied man to clear the lands, build the fences, and make bread for the helpless families; there was neither money nor labor to spare for manufacturing purposes. Then manufacturing was in its infancy; it had to be rocked in its cradle; it needed nourishment; hence could reasonably nurse at agriculture's breast. Not so now. From thirteen States we have advanced to thirty-eight; from an area of 350,000 square miles we have to-day 4,000,000; from less than $3,000,000 in revenue we have now $400,000,000; from $2,000,000,000 we now have over $42,000,000,000 of property; from 3,000,000 of inhabitants we have over 50,000,000; from 500 post-offices we have over 47,000; from no railroad we have 115,000 miles, tapping every commercial city, town, village, and hamlet almost in all of our interior, transporting $18,000,000,000 worth of commerce annually, and pouring the surplus into ocean ports; from no inland navigation we now have over 20,000 miles plowed by steamboats, tapping every water city and emptying the surplus into ocean ports; from no outland commerce the bottoms of vessels of every nation flood the bosom of the ocean till the waves roll from one to the other and their flags dot the air as the lily does the valley. From little seacoast and few ports we now have over 6,000 miles of coast and over 100 ports of entry; from no labor in manufacturing establishments there is now over 2,500,000; from no capital there is now employed $5,000,000,000 in manufacturing enterprises coping with the world, and manufacture four-fifths of what is consumed by 50,000,000 of people, while the balance of the world only manufacture one-fifth of what we consume. We send one-fifth we manufacture to other lands; from an infant they have grown to be a giant in the past century.

The question is asked, "Can they not now stand alone? Are they not grown to manhood? Pray tell me, how long will they continue to suck the life-blood from their mother's breast? Can she not wean them?" They stand as a mighty giant, feeding upon better and sweeter meats than all other industry, controlling some three or four hundred thousand votes, besides monopolies of gigantic proportions. Take the banks, who control several hundred thousand voters, $5,000,000,000 worth of property; the great railroad corporations, equally as powerful in controlling votes and capital, and besides the interior transportation. They form a trinity, they are triplets; the same blood flows through the veins of each; here the three great attributes of the nation are under the control of huge corporations.

Even England, when she wants to go to war, must get on her knees to the Rothschilds for money. Think of the condition of our own Government, with banks controlling the currency of the country, manufacturers controlling that branch, and the great railroad corporations controlling transportation of the country. No way to manufacture implements of war or clothing for soldiers, no way of transporting soldiers, munitions of war, or provisions for them. No money to pay for services, clothing, or provisions. The nation must get upon her knees and pray to her God for deliverance. Unite the power of these great corporation, and to-day they can march to the city of liberty, take the Government by the throat, and choke it down as a pigmy in the hands of a giant.

The creation of great moneyed corporations is monarchical in its tendency; by it the nation is shearing itself of that much sovereign power and vesting it in petty governments in its midst. Corporations are invisible, intangible beings; they have no soul, can commit no crime; they are neither responsible to God nor man. The Government should retain control of its own currency, rein all corporations under its control to the letter of their limit, let the States create and control corporations, that their power be divided and not united, and the Government keep all its sovereignty within its own bosom. The great principles of the Democratic party on the tariff have been enunciated from the foundation in their platforms, as follows:

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND THE TARIFF—WHAT THE DEMOCRATS HAVE AFFIRMED TOUCHING PROTECTIVE TAXES IN ALL THEIR PARTY PLATFORMS.

[From the New York World.]

The first Democratic platform was adopted by the party, then called "Republicans," as distinguished from the Federalist party, in a Congressional caucus at Philadelphia in 1800, the year in which Jefferson was first elected to the Presidency. It demands:

"6. Free commerce with all nations, political connection with none, and little or no diplomatic establishments."

The next Democratic platform, known as the "Locofoco" platform of 1838, was adopted by the first national convention for nominating candidates for the Presidency. It proclaims—

"Hostility to any and all monopolies by legislation because they are violations of the equal rights of the people.

"The true foundation of republican government is the equal rights of every citizen in his person and property and its management."

The next Democratic platform was that of 1840, adopted by the Presidential convention at Baltimore, which contains these resolutions:

"Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country.

"5. Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government."

The Democratic convention of 1844 reaffirmed the fourth and fifth resolutions of the convention of 1840.

The Democratic national convention of 1848—

"Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, and for the gradual but certain extinction of the debt created by the prosecution of a just and necessary war. And that the results of Democratic legislation in this and all other financial measures, upon which issues have been made between the two political parties of the country, have demonstrated to careful and practical men of all parties their soundness, safety, and utility in all business pursuits.

"Resolved, That the fruits of the great political triumph of 1844 have fulfilled the hopes of the Democracy of the Union, in the noble impulse given to the cause of free trade by the repeal of the tariff of 1842, and the creation of the more equal, honest, and protective tariff of 1846, and that in our opinion it would be a fatal error to weaken the bands of a political organization by which these great reforms have been achieved and risk them in the hands of their known adversaries, with whatever delusive appeals they may solicit our surrender of that vigilance which is the only safeguard of liberty."

The Democratic convention of 1852—

"Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government and for the gradual but certain extinction of the public debt.

"Resolved, That in view of the condition of popular institutions in the Old World a high and sacred duty is devolved with increased responsibility upon the Democracy of this country, as the party of the people, to uphold and maintain the rights of every State, and thereby the Union of States, and to sustain and advance among them constitutional liberty by continuing to resist all monopolies and exclusive legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many."

In 1856 the Democratic national convention—

"Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion of our common country."

It also repeated verbatim the first resolution quoted above of the convention of 1852, and then it—

"Resolved, finally, That there are questions connected with the foreign policy of this country which are inferior to no domestic questions whatever. The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world, and, by solemn manifestations, to place their moral influence at the side of their successful example."

In 1860 both the Douglas and Breckinridge platforms reaffirmed the resolutions of 1856, quoted above.

In 1864, the continuation of the civil war, which made imprudently high duties necessary to raise sufficient revenue, precluded the necessity of discussing the extraordinary and willingly endured burdens imposed by it on the people of the Northern States, and nothing was said about the tariff.

The Democratic convention of 1868 demanded—

"3. Payment of all the public debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable, all money drawn from the people by taxation, except so much as is requisite for the necessities of the Government, economically administered, being honestly applied to such payment. * * *

"6. * * * A tariff for revenue upon foreign imports and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country."

In 1872 the Democratic convention (so called) at Baltimore—which was, in fact, a Greeley and not a Democratic convention at all—did not adopt any Democratic resolutions, but indorsed the platform of the Liberal Republican convention held at Cincinnati, which contained the following curious declaration making the tariff "a local issue:" * * * "We remit the discussion of the subject (protection and free trade) to the people in their Congressional districts and the decision of Congress thereon, wholly free from executive interference or dictation."

This is the only hiatus in the chain of assertions by the Democratic party of the doctrine of a tariff for revenue only. It resulted in the shameful defeat of a candidate supported by the party in defiance alike of principle and of policy.

In 1876 the Democratic convention spoke with no uncertain voice:

"We denounce the present tariff, levied upon nearly four thousand articles, as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufacturers at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture—an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue."

In the Democratic platform of 1880 the old doctrine was tersely reproclaimed:

"Home rule, honest money, consisting of gold, silver, and paper convertible on demand; the strict maintenance of the public faith, state and national, and a tariff for revenue only."

Here it is seen the Democratic party has never fostered monopolies, but have maintained a tariff for revenue, and advocated equality in all industries, special favors to none. Every tariff, even for revenue, protects manufacturers to the extent of four times the amount of revenue raised. What more can they ask? If 50 per cent. be placed upon an article imported, they sell the same article manufactured here 50 per cent. higher than they otherwise could, as I have heretofore demonstrated. Pennsylvania wants the tariff high on iron, South Carolina on rice, Louisiana on sugar, and many of the Middle States on wool, &c. but this is all local. A tariff should be national, and so arranged as to bring the most revenue with the least duty. It is argued that a protective tariff brings the markets nearer to us; the cheapest market is always the nearest financially.

If my next-door neighbor would charge me 25 cents to sharpen a plow, and one a mile off charge me 10 cents for the same work, the one farthest away would be the nearest to me financially. So the same reason applies to all. I buy and sell—in the cheapest market for what I buy, and the highest to sell. A high tariff is an embargo, and fosters monopolies and destroys revenue. A low tariff gives more freedom to trade, breaks down monopolies, and increases revenue by increasing importation. The discrimination in the tariff should point in favor of labor and the great masses of the people; hence the duty should be, as much as possible, taken from such articles as are the prime necessities of life. Salt should be on the free-list, as it is used by every man, woman, and child to preserve and adapt food to the nourishment of the human body; also matches—they are of universal utility; trace-chains, plows used for farming, chopping-axes—these are the laborer's absolute necessities in cultivating the land, protecting us from cold, and procuring the necessary sustenance of human and animal life; also sewing, darning, and knitting needles, and brooms, because they are the absolute necessaries of housewifery, used by our poor, burdened women.

The Bible should be, because it is the book of God. It should be so cheapened as to lay upon the mantel of every family. If we tax the Holy Ghost, upon the same principle we should have a right to tax the Son and Father. It is a shame and disgrace to a religious and enlightened people to tax the Bible and prevent the spread of religion, when God has given us the earth, air, and water, with all their treasures, free of charge, and only retained one day to himself out of every seven. It is a wonder there is not a tax on air and water, and even upon the soul as it leaves the body, and a sentinel at the gate to charge entrance fee for entering heaven. If these were not impossibilities they certainly would have been on the tax-list.

The only vestige of happiness and enjoyment of liberty left for the poor toiling millions on earth is the ballot-box and a free seat in heaven hereafter. Strike them down and his last hope is doomed, doomed! Shall it be said that this great and grand Republic will tax the oil from them, that their lights will be out when the bridegroom comes, and leave them in darkness forever, forever? May God forbid. I lay out the foregoing as a general line of policy which I think should be pursued. The duty on brooms is 35 per cent.; revenue received in 1882 $1,125.25; 1883 to June 30, $746.50. Needles 25 per cent.; duty $111,-534.23 in 1882; in 1883 to June 30, $105,301. Matches 35 per cent.; duty 1882, $788.88; 1883 to June 30, $4,267.09. Salt, in all kinds of packages, 12 cents per 100 pounds; in bulk, 8 cents per 100. Total, 1882, $715,243.13; duty 1883 to July 30, $705,844.48. The fiscal year is from June 30 of each year.

The Bible being mixed up with other publications, I can not tell the exact duty on it for each year, but it is 25 per cent. So the total revenue received on the above articles for the fiscal year from June 30, 1882, to June 30, 1883, is $1,644,843.56 in duties on imports, and four times as much by the manufacturers at home, making $6,519,374.26. Total account taken from the laboring men and women of our country annually, $8,164,217.82 on these few articles of absolute necessity. Trace-chains, plows for farming purposes, and chopping axes, I am not able to ascertain, being mixed up with other articles. These would be immense.

RECAPITULATION.

First, let the public lands be sold to private settlers only and the money used for the payment of the public debt and supporting the Government.

Second. Make the Post-Office Department self-sustaining.

Third. Put the internal revenue upon articles heretofore mentioned, such as income, sale of whisky, brandy, wine, &c., so as to have the fewest possible number of officers to collect it. Dismiss the seven or eight thousand revenue officers; relieve the Government of paying ten or twelve million dollars in salaries thereby.

Fourth. Remove the Government taxes from land, labor, and the products of the soil in the hands of the producer and his immediate vendee.

Fifth. Remove the tariff as far as possible from the prime necessities of life.

Sixth. Cut down the salaries of officers, from the President to corporal, to a comparative basis of other pursuits of life.

Seventh. Lessen the number of Presidential appointees, now consisting of about 115,000. Put the pruning-knife of the nation to the tree of government; cut from every branch the dead limbs and excrescences; let them fall to the ground, they but cumber the tree; remove from all the avenues the blood-suckers, leeches, and hungry office-seekers that plunder the Treasury, feed upon the fat of the land, and impoverish the masses of the people; bring back to the cheeks of the nation the former red, rosy bloom of health; let its heart be filled with healthy blood swelled to mountain size. Swing upon the pendulum of liberty, and at every throb send out through the arteries and veins the pure, real, healthy blood to all extremities, that the impoverished may once more be fattened.

The tariff bill approved March 3, 1883, is one of monopoly and paid for by the laborer. It discriminates in the wrong way; it fosters capital and burdens labor; besides I conscientiously believe it is unconstitutional. The Constitution requires that all revenue bills shall originate in the House. Here a bill originated in the House to reform the excise (internal-revenue taxes) and passed and was thus sent to the Senate, where a bill to establish a tariff (duty and impost tax) originated, and was attached to the House bill as an amendment.

In the English Parliament all revenue bills have to originate in the House of Commons and they go to the House of Lords. No amendment can be attached to them whatever; they must pass as they left the House or be rejected. The reason for this was that the people had the taxes to pay and the House of Commons was elected by the people, was their immediate representatives, and could be called to account for any unnecessary burden in taxes, while the House of Lords did not depend upon the people for their offices, but inherited them by blood. Our Congress was formed somewhat after the manner of the English Parliament. This House is elected by the people and is the people's representatives, while the Senate is elected by the Legislatures of the States and represents the States as sovereigns.

Now the only difference and additional power given to our Senate over the House of Lords is the power to amend revenue bills; the amendments must be germane to the bill. And, on the same subject-matter, if a bill originates in the House to lay and collect direct taxes, the amendment must be on the subject of direct taxes; if to lay and collect excise (internal taxes), then the amendment must relate to internal taxes; if on imposts and duties (taxes on imports), then the amendment should relate to import taxes. If the Senate had a right to originate a tariff bill by way of amendment, then they would have a right to tack on a direct tax, when there was no law to lay and collect direct taxes, thereby originating a direct tax bill; thus the power of amendment would be converted into the power of originating, consequently would be carrying out the doctrine of a broad and latitudinarian construction of the Constitution.

A strict adherence to the Constitution and a literal construction of the same, with only such incidental powers as are absolutely necessary to carry into effect the express power, is the true doctrine to preserve the liberties of the people and maintain the continuity of this Republic. The Democratic party has adhered to this doctrine from the origin of the Government. Other and various parties have sprung up on the disaffection of that party at different times and epochs in the history of the Government, but like wet-weather springs vanished when the rain ceased.

This grand old party maintained and tolerated all the grand and noble elements of a republic, recognizing the sovereignty as in the people, and all free governments as founded on their authority, equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none; general legislation for all, special legislation for none; freedom of thought and freedom of expression, freedom of speech and freedom of the press, freedom of the pen and freedom of the tongue, freedom of the ballot-box and freedom to hold office; equality in the distribution of public burdens and taxation to support the Government alone, freedom of religious worship and a general distribution of knowledge, freedom of air and water, equal protection in life, liberty, property, and the pursuits of happiness. No lords; no kings; open courts. No star-chamber, no king's benches, no perpetuities in office or property, no primogeniture laws or tying up property to endless generations to come; developing the resources of nature in accordance with her laws, and recognizing labor as an honorable occupation.

These great principles are interwoven in the very idiom of Democratic speech and action; they inhale them at every breath, cultivate them at every step, sleep with them at night, and walk with them by daylight, play with them in the green fields, and sail with them on the broad ocean, decorate them with flowers, and smooth the path they tread. They are the grand old guards of liberty and the Constitution, rocked in Democratic cradles, and nursed at Democratic breasts, fed at the tables of Democracy, and reared by Democratic hands, and to succeed in 1884. The party must stand on the Constitution, with liberty in the right hand, justice in the left, cross the Rubicon, and march to the heart of Rome through the ballot-box.

THE PEOPLE'S INTEREST IN 1884.

The storm is approaching; its foreshadow is cast. The political winds are sweeping over 4,000,000 square miles of territory and over the heads of 50,000,000 of people. The foundations of monopolies are trembling. Let the winds of liberty sweep over every hill, through every valley, and the toiling millions be awakened to due vigilance. This is the price of liberty. All must recognize that it will be a calamity to the country if the Democratic party does not succeed in 1884. Why a calamity? I answer, from the very nature of things. Under the rule of the Republican party, allying themselves with the capitalists and monopolists, they have made the rich richer and the poor poorer, until the time has come when this state of affairs must not, can not, and should no longer exist.

We are told that this country is rich and growing richer. True the Government is rich with $140,000,000 surplus in the Treasury, and a few have grown fat and show great wealth in the statistics of the country, but the great masses show but little; poverty covers them with rags and their children cry for bread. Let every man be wide awake, a sentinel on watch at liberty's door. Summons all from the hills, hollows, and valleys to the ballot-box. Sweep down tyranny as the mighty avalanche does the mountain-side. Roll up millions from every quarter for the great conflict of 1884, and liberty will once more perch upon the nation's brow in its full plumage and healthy robe. Seek to tear down no body, no industry, no class, but stand to the flag of freedom. Let it wave overhead in the air, and let no one tear it or this Government down. In case we win, reform will take place; the shackles will be stricken from the people, and general emancipation will take place; thus equality of rights will be accomplished in a legitimate and statesmanlike way by the people and for the people; but if the people lie idle and allow monopolists to take charge of them for four years longer, God alone can tell the destinies of this proud nation.

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. Chairman, it can not be expected that in the short time allowed me I will attempt any general discussion of the tariff question. I shall therefore only attempt, in perhaps a very irregular way, merely to notice two or three phases of the arguments presented here by those who advocate protection.

That the question is an important one is attested by the fact that it has excited on this floor and at the other end of this Capitol, almost from the beginning of our Government down to this time, perhaps the ablest, the longest, and the most earnest debates that have occurred upon any question, save the secession movement and questions growing out of slavery. Its importance is further attested by the fact that it has for some time been constantly discussed by the newspapers of the country, and the discussion has now been taken up by the people, so that at the present time, at anyrate in the West, they are inquiring for documents, books, speeches, and papers on the tariff question.

The issue presented by the bill under discussion is a plain one. We all know—those who administer our financial affairs tell us, and nobody doubts—that we are annually raising millions upon millions more money by taxation than is needed by the Government, and the question is how to avoid raising more money than is necessary; what provision shall be made to cut down taxation, and the revenue, so as to benefit the people.

In the brief time allowed me I wish to notice particularly one argument which has been stated and restated, which has been pressed upon the House in this discussion and urged upon the people through the public press and by speakers of the Republican party on all possible occasions. They tell us that since the Republican party assumed the reins of government in this country and adopted as the governmental policy the protective tariff our progress has been remarkable. Well, it has been remarkable. Our progress from the beginning of the Government to the present time has been remarkable. It will challenge the admiration of every American, of every thoughtful person who studies the rise and history of governments. But I deny that it is properly attributable to the protection policy, and I believe a review of our tariff legislation and an examination of our statistics will justify my position.

The history of tariff agitation in this country shows a continual struggle on the part of manufacturers and other favored interests to increase their advantages and interests by means of legislation, which will give them artificial advantages not possessed by or provided for others. During the early history of our Government "incidental protection," as it is called, was asked for by the interests named, merely on the ground that they were "infant industries," and unable, because of their "tender years," to compete with their more mature rivals in other countries.

The history of our tariff legislation shows that they have never been satisfied with the artificial advantages which have been accorded them by Congress from time to time; they have not been satisfied even with what has been asked for by themselves. Having obtained by legislation all the protection they asked for at one period, they have almost invariably soon begun to clamor for more. And far too often, in my humble judgment, they have obtained what they asked. At first and for a long time their demands were placed on the ground of their infancy; they simply wanted encouragement during the infantile period. Emboldened by their success in shaping legislation for their own advantage in the past, they have finally assumed a more advanced position, and demand "protection for protection's sake." It is not put upon the ground that they are still in their infancy, for as to many of them that plea after over a hundred years of existence would be so palpably absurd that even a protectionist has not the effrontery to plead it longer.

Our first tariff schedule, arranged, I believe, in 1789, sometimes called the Hamilton tariff, because prepared by Alexander Hamilton, laid an average duty of about 8 per cent. on the whole list of dutiable articles. Cottons and woolens bore a duty of 5 per cent. under this legislation. And that was considered high by many of our people.

Our second tariff law was enacted in 1816. Under this cottons and woolens bore a duty of 25 per cent., to be reduced by the terms of the act to 20 per cent. in three years thereafter.

Our third tariff act became a law in 1824. Under it the duties on woolens were about 30 per cent., to be raised the next year after its passage to 33⅓ per cent. The duties on cottons were about the same, and the average on all dutiable articles was about 33½ per cent.

The fourth general revision of our schedule occurred in 1828. The duties on woolens and cottons were again increased, and the average on all articles was about 43 per cent. So great were the increased burdens of the people under this act that a deep discontent was manifested, and it became evident that there was a real demand for reform. Congress entered on the work and was met by powerful opposition from those among its members who were more friendly to the protected and pampered "infant industries" than to the laboring classes, who had to pay dearly for the protection. So powerful were the protected "infants" that the friends of the people found it necessary, in order to secure any measure of relief, to enter into a compromise with their opponents, and the result was what is sometimes called the "compromise tariff" of 1832, under which the tariff duties were somewhat lowered, so that they averaged about 32 per cent. on the whole list between the years 1833 and 1842. And this was our fifth tariff act of a general nature.

The next general legislation on this subject was the act of 1842—the sixth—under which the previously protected interests secured a greater degree of protection than they enjoyed under the "compromise tariff;" this existed only four years.

In 1846 there was passed our seventh tariff act, generally known as the "Walker tariff," under which duties were placed lower than they had been for some time before. The average under this act was about 23 per cent.

In 1861, the war between the States having begun, more revenue was needed by the Government. The "infants" and their friends made the most of this necessity, and under our eighth general tariff act—the "Morrill tariff" of 1861—they secured in the main very high rates of duty on all their products liable to meet competition from abroad.

The average of the duties under this act was not far from 50 per cent., and some of the "infants," then a quarter of a century old, secured protection to the extent of 100 per cent. No other revision of a general nature occurred till last year, when our present tariff act, the ninth in number, was passed, ostensibly for the purpose of reducing tariff taxation and relieving the burdens of the people. As a matter of fact, the reductions are, as a rule, insignificant, and in some notable and important instances duties are thereby increased. The protective element is retained throughout. Indeed, it was confessedly devised and passed by the friends of the protective policy, and no one who has any fair knowledge of the subject can, in my humble judgment, sincerely believe that it was passed in good faith for the purpose of relieving the overtaxed and suffering consumers of the country.

War-tariff taxes had been maintained long after the necessity for them, so far as the Government was concerned, had ceased. The demand for a reduction had become so urgent that it could no longer be disregarded with impunity, nor postponed by such devices as a "tariff commission." Some relief, or something which could for the time being be claimed as in the nature of relief, must be furnished. Under this condition of things the protection party, after intercourse with the various "infants" of this country through its Tariff Commission, conceived and in great travail brought forth the present tariff act, which, if the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury are to be believed, has not furnished the just measure of relief that was demanded. The President, in his last annual message, speaking on this subject of tariff, says:

> I have no doubt that still further reductions may be wisely made.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, speaking of the same subject, says:

> There ought to be a reduction of taxation.

And again, speaking of the same subject and of the tariff act passed last year, he says:

> So the question still presses, what legislation is necessary to relieve the people of unnecessary taxes? As elsewhere suggested, it should not be assumed that the surplus in the Treasury will be consumed by lavish expenditures for objects of doubtful expediency or legality, or that the scheme which has been proclaimed, of exacting money from the people for the purpose of returning it to them by filtering distribution through State governments, will find any favor with Congress or the people.

And further on he says:

> The question recurs: Shall we now seek again for that reduction which was not attained, and is it now advisable to attempt a reduction of the revenues for future years to arise from duties on imports? There was general agreement that a substantial reduction of the tariff should be made. The estimates of the Tariff Commission and of the Senate committee show what was the contemplated reduction. The actual results so far obtained indicate that the reduction labored for has not been effected by the new tariff act. It is to be considered, too, that the failure is not to be charged to the increase of importations keeping up the amount of customs revenue. The statistics of our foreign commerce show that there has not been an increase chargeable therewith. As to the principles of reduction, if a revision be practicable, there seems to be little disagreement. The reduction should be made on articles entering into general consumption as necessaries.

And still further on in the same report, speaking of the position of the Treasury Department on this question, he says:

> It adheres, however, to its conviction that ultimately the just and expedient method of relief from taxation and of limiting the revenues to the needs of an economical government must be found in a reduction of the duties on imports.

Here it is conceded that prior to the passage of the act of 1883 substantial reductions of duties on imports were absolutely necessary, and it is also conceded that such reductions were not attained by the passage of that act; at any rate, not in the degree demanded.

It is true both these public functionaries, while plainly stating that further reductions can be wisely made and ought to be made, still advise us that it is not expedient to undertake it now. Why not? If a substantial general reduction from the modified Morrill tariff was demanded by and was due to the people, and it is conceded the act of last year did not accomplish the desired reduction, and conceded further reduction is necessary and may be wisely made, I can conceive of but one real reason.

The House of Representatives, where all such measures must originate, is Democratic, and if the reduction in taxation which is admittedly due to the people should be made now, the Democracy would no doubt receive from the relieved people of the country some of the credit, and that might have something to do with determining who shall control public affairs for the next Presidential term. Fairness requires me to state, and I do so cheerfully, that these officials undertake to furnish a different reason. In this attempt the President says:

> The results of the legislation of the last session of the Congress have not as yet become sufficiently apparent to justify any radical revision or sweeping modifications of existing law.

And the Secretary of the Treasury makes substantially the same statement. Mr. Chairman, have they really furnished any reason for longer delaying the much-needed relief? Have we not had a hundred years of experience in tariff legislation? Have we not before us, in two large volumes, the results of the arduous labors of that immortal makeshift, the Tariff Commission, which we were told before its creation would certainly furnish the material and information necessary to enable the Forty-seventh Congress to construct a just tariff act that would afford a substantial reduction of tariff taxes? The reason assigned is not sufficient. With our large cash surplus lying in the Treasury and being daily increased by the revenues collected from the people, with the experience of a hundred years to draw upon, I insist there is no reason why we should not at once proceed to do that which the President and Secretary of the Treasury say ought to be and must eventually be done.

The gentlemen upon the other side of this House, who are opposing this bill with a remarkable degree of unanimity, do not put their opposition upon the reason assigned by the official head of their party and reiterated by their Secretary of the Treasury. They base their opposition on the ground that reduction of customs duties is not necessary; that it would in fact be injurious, if not even disastrous, to the country.

In support of their theory they point with enthusiasm to the wonderful growth of our country in material wealth, and especially to the growth of its manufacturing interests during the two decades in which their protection policy has prevailed. That growth has, indeed, been wonderful. We can point to it with just pride and satisfaction. It is sufficient to excite the admiration of our free-trade neighbors beyond the Atlantic. But is it properly attributable to the protection policy? If it can be shown that the rate of growth was greater under a revenue policy what will gentlemen on the other side say? When this argument is presented we are justified in resorting to the statistics. We have them furnished to us by the Commissioner of the Census, and here they are, the values being stated on a gold basis, which is the only correct one in such instances:

	Value of manufactured products.	Rate per cent. of increase.
1850	$1,019,109,616
1860	1,885,861,676	85.05
1870	3,385,860,354	79.54

These official statistics show that during the last decade in which the Walker tariff was in force, and under which duties were generally much lower than in either of the decades since then, the rate per cent. of increase of manufactured products was higher than it has been since. They further show that under the much-lauded protection policy the rate per cent. of increase has been constantly shrinking.

Some one may ask, "Did we not have much more capital invested in manufactures in 1880 than in 1860?" I answer yes; and we had a much greater population, which of course demanded more manufacturing. Whatever increase there was in manufactures was the result of our natural growth in population, and was not induced by the high-tariff taxes the people paid.

The unlimited resources of our country, the great natural advantages we enjoyed, coupled with the energy and progressive character of our people, brought the increase in spite of the protection policy of the Republican party, which had control of the affairs of the Government during the period in which that policy has last prevailed.

The statistics from the same source also show that there was a like decrease in the per cent. of gain in the amount of capital invested in manufactures. The following table shows the results in that particular:

Years.	Capital invested in manufactures.	Per cent. of gain.
1850	$533,245,351
1860	1,009,855,715	89.38
1870	1,694,567,015	67.80
1880	2,790,272,606	64.66

Statistics from the same official source also show that from 1870 to 1880 the per cent. of gain in the amount of money paid for wages by the manufacturing interests of the country decreased. I give the official table here:

Year.	Wages paid by manufacturers.	Per cent. of gain.
1850	$236,759,464
1860	378,878,966	60.03
1880	947,953,795	52.78

This table shows an increase of the per cent. of gain from 1860 to 1870 over that from 1850 to 1860. This increase is no doubt due to the fact that during more than four years of that period a very large portion of the able-bodied males of our country were in the Army, which all of us know increased all classes of wage rates. The significant fact shown by this table is that during the decade from 1870 to 1880 the rate per cent. of gain of wages paid decreases materially. And it should be borne in mind that during that decade the protection policy enjoyed the palmiest days it has ever seen in this country.

For the purpose of enabling those who care to do so to consider in connection with the above statistics those showing the increase and the per cent. of gain or increase of our population during the same decades I give here another table:

Year.	Population.	Increase.
		Per cent.
1850	23,191,876
1860	31,443,321	35
1870	38,558,371	22½

I will not occupy any of the brief space of time allotted to me in discussing the relations between the increase of our population as shown by this last table and the facts shown by the preceding tables. The relations and the bearings of one on the other are, in some respects at least, so obvious as to need no comment.

The opponents of the bill under discussion also say that the reduction of duties is not necessary, and would, as they allege, be disastrous, because they say protection decreases the selling price of the protected article. In other words, they say if we place a high rate of duty on imported articles, thereby excluding them from our country altogether and preventing competition from foreign sources, the same classes of articles manufactured here will as a consequence sell for less money.

I do not understand why such a consequence should logically follow such premises. And to show that it does not, at least in one notable instance, I will here again resort to official figures. The wool tariff has been a source of much solicitude in some quarters recently. In 1867 the "wool tariff" act was passed, by which a high and protective duty was laid on all imported wools. It was confessedly done for the purpose of protection. Hon. Columbus Delano, late president of the Ohio Wool-Growers' Association, in an address delivered by him on the 16th of last January, on the occasion of his retirement from that office, said:

No proposition, however, is susceptible of clearer proof than this: that since wool-growers have had the security for their business afforded by the act of 1867 there has been a constant diminution in importations, a constant increase in domestic production, and a constant reduction in price.

That distinguished body of "experts" who composed the Tariff Commission made, officially, the same statement in regard to the alleged "constant reduction in price" of wool under the high-wool tariff. At page 28 of their report they say:

As a result of augmented production the price of wools has been reduced to the consumer.

They attribute the "augmented production" to the high tariff, and then allege that the augmented production reduced the price, and in support of their allegation as to the price they make this further statement:

The average price of the United States wool-clip in the Boston market, in currency, was:

1867	51 cents.
1870	46 cents.
1880	48 cents.

And here they left the matter of price. Is their statement a frank and fair one? Do their figures bear out their assertion and the assertion of Hon. Columbus Delano on the reduction of price under the high tariff? Apparently they do, but really they prove the contrary. I call your attention to the fact that they say the "average price" given by them is stated "in currency" values. Now, in 1867, when this high tariff was placed on wool, a dollar in currency was worth less in gold than at any subsequent time.

If they had seen proper to be candid, and had put their calculations on a gold basis, which is the only correct one for measuring real commercial values, their table quoted above would have stood as follows:

The average price of the United States wool-clip in the Boston market, in gold, was—

1867	36.2 cents.
1870	37.3 cents.
1875	38.1 cents.
1880	48.0 cents.

This shows a constant increase of the average price. The increase during the first eight years after the high duty was established was not great, but in the thirteen years covered by the Tariff Commission's calculations it was enormous—about 33 per cent. So that on the figures of that commission, which was strongly protectionist in its tendencies, its own statements on this matter of prices and the pretense of the wool-growers as placed before the world by their representative and champion, Hon. Columbus Delano, are not based on a foundation of fact. For the convenience of any who may wish to verify or test these calculations as to the gold value, I give here a table based on the official statements of the Treasury Department, showing the average annual value in gold of a dollar in currency in each fiscal year and each calendar year during the period covered by the calculations.

Table showing the annual value in gold of $1 in currency each calendar and fiscal year from 1867 to 1880, inclusive.

	Calendar year.	Fiscal year ending June 30.
1867	.724	.709
1868	.716	.715
1869	.752	.727
1870	.087	.811
1871	.895	.887
1872	.089	.894
1873	.879	.873
1874	.899	.893
1875	.087	.888
1876	.898	.878
1877	.954	.927
1878	.992	.976
1880	1.000	1.000

Other figures might readily be given to show the absurdity, not to say falsity, of the claim that a high tariff reduces the price of the domestic article. Is it necessary to furnish statistics to show such a claim is not true as a general thing? Why is "protection" asked? Is it not for the benefit of those who are "protected?" Would it benefit them to reduce the price of their commodities? The real truth is that protection keeps the prices of the protected articles higher than they would otherwise be. Now, who pays for this protection? Evidently the consumers of the protected articles.

In the case of wool, almost if not quite everybody in the country contributes to it. Woolen goods of all kinds are more costly with that high tariff on wool than they would be without it. When the humble mother buys the blanket in which she wraps her baby she pays for a part of it. When she buys the stockings to protect its little feet she pays for more of it. When she buys the woolen clothing it must have in after years she pays for still more of it. When the baby has grown to manhood he begins to assist in paying for protection. When in old age he lies upon his death-bed the blankets adjusted about him by loving hands are taxed, first and last, about 100 per cent. to pay for "protection." And thus, from the cradle to the grave, the consumers of woolen goods are called on to aid in providing protection—and for whom? Those who are clamoring here for an increased duty on wool tell us it is for the benefit of "the farmer." All at once they have developed a wonderful solicitude for him.

Let us consider that phase of the question. If the abominable system really reduced the price of wool as claimed, how could it protect him? A great many farmers have a few sheep. Very few have large flocks. For the purpose of getting at the real facts in this matter and showing the true relation which this wool "protection" actually bears to the farmers I will give here a statement showing approximately the sheep and wool statistics of the State in which I live—Illinois. Number of flocks, 39,803; number of sheep, 1,037,073; average number to the flock, 26; gross annual wool-clip, 6,093,066; number of pounds to the sheep, 6; average price per pound in 1880, 48 cents.

We are told by the advocates of protection for wool that here are 39,000, nearly 40,000, farmers in Illinois alone who will be benefited by the protection policy, and we are charged with being inimical to the interest of the farmer because we refuse to make the tariff on wool practically a prohibition of importation and thereby raise the price of the home-grown commodity. If that plan decreased the price as claimed, I do not think these farmers, each with twenty-six sheep, would thank us for such protection. But of course that claim is utterly groundless. Now, the average number in the flock being twenty-six, and the average annual yield per head six pounds, the average crop to the farmer is one hundred and fifty-six pounds.

The amount of protection each farmer will receive per year under the high tariff of 1867, even if he receives in the price the full benefit of the whole protection, will not exceed a few dollars. Is this clear gain? Not by any means. Each one of these farmers must buy blankets, stockings, coats, and other woolen goods, on which he will pay prices enhanced by this protection policy to a degree that will wipe out his small amount of protection and draw largely on his other funds.

This is the inevitable result to ninety-nine out of every one hundred of the sheep-owners. The few who own immensely large flocks and make a business of growing wool upon an extensive scale will be benefited by the protection, but the mass of those classed by gentlemen as "flock-masters" will be injured by it.

Now I wish for a moment or two to ask your attention to the manner in which the "wool tariff" of 1867 was secured. On this I will resort to the address of the chief representative of the Ohio wool-growers, from whom I have already quoted. He frankly tells us how it was done. He says:

> The wool tariff of 1867 was not a general tariff law. It was simply an act of Congress to carry out and enforce a solemn agreement deliberately made after much consultation and consideration between producers and manufacturers of wool in the United States. It was enacted mainly for the protection of the wool-growers and to encourage sheep-husbandry, and was properly called a "wool tariff."
> The reasons for this agreement are both obvious and forcible. Wool-growers prior to this law had received no substantial legislative protection, while manufacturers had obtained all they demanded and more than they needed.

The effrontery displayed is unsurpassed, and the naïve frankness of the whole address is admirable. He says the manufacturers of woolen goods had obtained all the protection they demanded "and more than they needed." Bear this in mind—they had more protection than they needed. In the same connection he says:

> Observe the consequences: Manufacturers of wool were prosperous and capital sought investment in their business. Their monopoly gave them control of our markets and prosperity attended their pursuits. Their accumulated capital could not be concealed, for its existence was seen in Western corporations, in Eastern companies going West for investments, and in the general ownership of Western property and Western enterprises.
> New England was too small to absorb the constantly increasing capital of her industrious, prosperous, well-protected manufacturers.

These monopolists in the woolen manufacturing business, who "had obtained all they demanded" and "more than they needed" of the blessings of protection, had grown so immensely wealthy that "New England was too small to absorb the constantly increasing capital of her industrious, prosperous, well-protected manufacturers." Yes; Hon. Columbus Delano, late president of the Wool-Growers' Association in that State, whence arises the principal part of the clamor for an increase of tariff on raw wool, tells us frankly that in 1867 the manufacturers of woolen goods had all the protection they demanded and more than they needed, whereby they had obtained enough of somebody's money to render them too wealthy for New England to contain them. They had on his showing become monopolists.

And what does he do? Do he and his wool-growing friends undertake to have Congress remove any of this excessive protection which these manufacturers do not need, and which has already made monopolists of them? No. On the contrary, they enter into a contract—"a solemn agreement, deliberately made"—with these same confessedly overprotected monopolists, under and as a result of which "solemn agreement," by some means always accessible to the "well-protected manufacturers" when they want legislation, the wool-tariff bill was passed; and the large flock-masters of the country were also passed—passed from the honest, fair-dealing classes of self-reliant industry to the overprotected, grasping monopolist classes. And after telling us that the high tariff on wool, which I have shown increases the price to all consumers, was obtained by entering into "a solemn agreement, deliberately made" with what he himself calls overprotected monopolists, to influence legislation here in years gone by, he and his friends appeal to us in this Congress to increase the tariff on raw wool. I am glad to know it will certainly not be done.

The whole scheme is for the protection and enrichment of the few at the expense of the many. This is true of all the so-called protection schemes. Protection has built up and perpetuated gigantic monopolies, which have imposed on the people of this country long enough. It has induced the aggregation of capital in a few hands. It has destroyed the small industries which once enlivened the villages, towns, and smaller places all over the country, and caused the manufacturing interests to concentrate mainly in great centers. It has made the rich richer and the poor poorer.

If protection protects, it does so by maintaining higher prices than would otherwise prevail on the protected articles. If it does this, then some of our own people pay for it and others reap the benefit. It will not do to tell us all are equally benefited by it. If all are equally benefited, then nobody is protected. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], who has just closed an excellent speech against the iniquitous system, is protected equally with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVANS], who this evening sought to show us its shining virtues, and if the latter is equally protected with me, if each is protected equally with every other one, then we are really in the same attitude as if protection had never been thought of. We are relatively in the same position as if the system did not exist.

If protection gives each individual an equal chance and an equal benefit with each other one, then you may just as well tell me a man can grow rich by taking money out of his right pocket and putting it into his left one as to tell me our prosperity can be promoted by such a system. If all do not reap an equal benefit from the system, then the hard-earned money of some is taken from them on false pretenses and without consideration and put into the pockets of others who have no right to it. And this latter is the real fact. The laborers and wage-earners are paying more for the necessaries of life than they ought to pay.

The manufacturers, who as a rule are rich enough already, are thereby amassing more riches, spending the warm season at the seaside, and diversifying their pleasures by visiting the capital in the winter, on which occasion they combine business with pleasure, and seek a little more protection at the hands of Congress. Of course they tell us that they are seeking it from purely disinterested and philanthropic motives—for the sole purpose of enabling them to pay better wages to their operatives and to enable them to compete with the "pauper labor" of Europe. The protection being granted, they immediately go or send some one across the Atlantic and make wholesale contracts with those same "pauper laborers," and import them to this country to work on low wages, and thereby drive our own laboring classes out of employment. Testimony taken by one of the committees of this House this winter and reported by its chairman, himself a protectionist, shows that such labor has been so imported into this country by some of these disinterested and philanthropic protected interests.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to notice some other phases of the case, and especially some of the horrifying word-pictures of European poverty and squalor and want which have been drawn here. The gentlemen who have sought to convince us and convert us to the protection theory by such means know full well that it is not necessary to cross the Atlantic to find the originals for such pictures. They know also that those in England are no more to be attributed to the British free-trade policy than those here are to be attributed to our protective policy.

In England the larger part of this abject poverty may be fairly attributed to those defects in their government always attendant on a system of royalty and feudal tenures. In this country it is attributable in some instances to one cause, in other instances to others, intensified a little in each by the higher prices which the absolute necessaries of life bear on account of the high tax on nearly all things consumed by the poor.

Mr. Chairman, I am admonished that the brief time allowed to me has about expired. I desire to say in conclusion that I am glad the issue is so plainly made here. I hope there will be no more temporizing, no juggling with words. If we are to continue a system which builds up colossal fortunes for the few at the expense of the many, let us have it so determined on a plain, unmistakable issue. If a different and, in my humble judgment, much more beneficent policy is to prevail let us have it so settled, with a perfect understanding of how it is obtained and what it is to be. For my own part, I would not if I could secure success by a compromise of those ends which make it desirable.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, if the whole of mankind would observe the Golden Rule in their dealings and intercourse with each other, if all the governments and peoples of the earth would put out of sight all considerations of personal or political distinctions, and each should be willing to regard the interests of each of the others as exactly equal to his own, and would be as solicitous for the welfare of all the others as for his own, if men and nations were entirely unselfish, then I might be willing to indorse the doctrine of "buying where we could buy the lowest, and selling where we could sell the highest."

"But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel," was said centuries ago, and it establishes two facts:

First. That men and nations are selfish.

Second. That when that fact is recognized it is criminally wrong to neglect a watchful care over and protection of our own.

I lay down the following rules of personal and political action:

First. I must care for and protect my family rather than yours.

Second. I must take care of the interest of the people who sent me here rather than of the interest of the people of any other district.

Third. I must legislate for the prosperity of the people of the United States rather than of the people of any other nation on earth. Following this rule as applied to this question of "protection," or "free trade," or "tariff for revenue only," or "tariff for revenue with incidental protection," and I am led to the conclusion that it should be settled on the principle of "protection" and only "protection."

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois who sits before me [Mr. MORRISON] I understood to favor a "tariff for revenue with incidental protection."

Mr. MORRISON. Not a bit of it.

Mr. PRICE. Well, then his plan is a tariff for revenue without any protection.

Mr. MORRISON assented.

Mr. PRICE. And I favor a tariff for protection only. One of us is radically wrong.

I hold to the doctrine adopted by some of our most sagacious writers on political economy, that "the wealth of a nation should support its government," and to raise our revenue by taxing consumption is in direct violation of this principle, because a family of five persons whose whole worldly wealth is not greater than $1,000 will consume as many of the necessaries of life as a family of the same number who possess wealth equal to $100,000.

Upon the principle laid down, "that the wealth of a nation should support its government," the first-named family should pay $1 while the second should pay $100, while under the plan of "tariff for revenue" each would pay the same amount.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman whether I understood him correctly as stating that he does not believe in the doctrine that a nation ought to have the right to buy where it can buy the cheapest and sell where it can sell the dearest. I simply want to get the gentleman right on the record.

Mr. PRICE. I am perfectly willing to be put on record. I said if this world were entirely unselfish, and that if each one would take the same guardian care over another that he would of himself, I would indorse that doctrine. I will now say that until we reach that condition of society I will not indorse the doctrine of buying where you can buy the cheapest and selling where you can sell the dearest. The application of the same principle would, with equal certainty, destroy the theory of a "tariff for revenue with incidental protection." The only question remaining to be settled is which policy would best advance the interests and well-being of the American people, "free trade" or "protection?"

No government on earth is like ours, therefore no precedents have been established to guide us unerringly in deciding this question. The workingmen of other countries, with the product of whose labor ours comes in competition, are not called upon or permitted to exert the same influence in governmental affairs that the workingmen of America do. Therefore the same necessity does not exist that he should own himself, own his home, and be entirely free to govern himself and to regulate his political action, guided only by his own conscience of right and duty. A higher degree of intelligence is required of the workingmen of America than is necessary in any other country, because every American is a voter, and to that extent a ruler, and every consideration of prudence would dictate that his intellectual condition should be of a higher order, participating as he does in the Government, than is required of those who live beneath the government and of whom the task of reflection or independent action is not demanded or guaranteed.

To secure these results the most liberal scale of wages should be paid to the workingmen of our country, that they may thereby become sufficiently intelligent to meet all the high requirements of citizenship, not because he is any better, or purer, or more patriotic, but because he is a part of the Government. Brought, as he would be by the adoption of the principle of free trade, in competition with that other class, he would have no time for self-culture, he could know but little of the spirit or purpose of our form of government, and would be in the worst possible condition to exercise that highest and most important act of citizenship, the elective franchise.

Again, I deem it of the first importance that every citizen of our common country should be attached to our common form of government, desire its perpetuity, and feel disposed to vigilantly guard it from domestic enemies and foreign foes. These can not be the feelings of a man who is either overworked or underfed. No man can be attached to a system of laws which reduces him to a condition of semi-slavery, that sends him at night to a home of bare walls, bare floors, a tired, ragged, and dejected wife and children, with nothing to read, and too tired to read a book or paper if he had it.

"Tariff for revenue only" must have the inevitable tendency to produce this result, because the working people would thus be brought in direct competition in the battle of life with men of other countries whose aspirations or ambitions are on no higher plane.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir. I am willing to yield to any gentleman for a question.

Mr. WELLER. Is it not true that we have within the jurisdiction of our Government to-day want and poverty, and do they not occur in parts of the country that enjoy all the benefits of the protective system which the gentleman advocates?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir; and we have snakes, we have cholera and small-pox, and we have a thousand ills that afflict humanity, no one of which is attributable to the protective system. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. I will be glad to ask one further question, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. PRICE. Certainly.

Mr. WELLER. To what does the gentleman attribute the want and poverty that is inflicted upon the people, if in no part due to the protective system?

Mr. PRICE. I attribute 99 per cent. of it to the saloons kept by pirates, legalized by demagogues, and patronized by fools. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. I am pleased to know the gentleman's idea in the premises.

Mr. PRICE. If any gentleman wishes enlightenment I am pleased to be interrogated. I have no opinions which I wish to keep secret on this or any other subject.

It would be madness to place one entirely ignorant of the act of navigation at the helm of a ship on which were embarked fifty millions of the human family, with all they possessed or held dear, and equally absurd to place that precious freight in the hands of one who, being skilled, cared not to make a safe and prosperous voyage. It is equally shocking to every common-sense idea of self-preservation to make or keep the American voter in a condition of ignorance of the genius and purpose of our republican form of government, or to subject him to such a condition of affairs as will weaken his attachment to it and leave him reckless and indifferent as to its future progress or decay. It is not for the protection of the manufacturer, as such, that I plead, but it is for the American citizen, the American voter, and thus the American ruler. It is of great importance that we study and adopt the best methods of producing cotton, grain, cattle, and utilizing all the various agencies that tend to the highest and happiest type of civilization. But it is of infinitely more importance that we pursue the best course to produce the highest type of men—great, broad, intelligent, independent men—

> Men whom the spoils of office can not buy—
> Men who can stand before a demagogue
> And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
> Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
> In public duty and in private thinking:
> For while the rabble with their thumb-worn creeds,
> Their large professions and their little deeds,
> Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
> Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps.

Men who, when they deposit their ballot, fully realize that they are discharging the citizen's most sacred duty, as he thereby places his hand upon the machinery of the State freighted with the possessions of fifty millions of freemen, and with the hopes of this and all succeeding generations, and giving tone and direction to a republic resting upon the intelligence, patriotism, and morality of its people. All this is a necessity if, as is alleged, such a system should make an additional cost to the consumer of 10 or 100 per cent. But I deny that such is the theory or tendency of protection. To prove this permit me to call the attention of the country to a few facts.

Galvanized fence-wire can now be bought for $60 per ton. A ton will make a four-wire fence two hundred rods long, or it will cost 30 cents per rod. A four-board fence six inches wide at $15 per thousand will cost 56 cents per rod. The distance around forty acres of land is three hundred and twenty rods. The difference, then, in the cost of fencing forty acres is $83.20; besides, something is saved in the number of posts used and something more in nails. The posts will last longer, because the pressure of the wind is not so great, and the wire will last much longer than the boards. Apply this principle to all the fences in all the country, and the amount saved to the farmers is simply enormous, probably sufficient to greatly overbalance all the additional cost to the agriculturists on all other articles of consumption affected injuriously by a protective tariff. There can be found none who will dispute the fact that this cheap iron wire is the legitimate result of "protecting our home manufactures."

But you say, strike the tariff from lumber and thus reduce the price $2 per thousand feet. I answer that such would not be the effect of admitting lumber free, that it would simply enable the Canadian lumber-dealer to raise his price that amount, which he would do, as all mankind are about alike to the extent of taking all they can get for the article or commodity they have for sale.

But suppose that I am in error in this conclusion, I deny that the agriculturist would be benefited by the reduction were it to take place—because in the State of Wisconsin alone the number of men engaged in the lumber business is about 35,000. It is fair to presume that each man is one of a family of at least three persons, which would make an aggregate of 105,000 persons who are consumers and not producers of agricultural products. It employs about 28,000 horses and 7,000 oxen. It will cost $13,125,000 to pay these men, which is kept and circulated at home. It will cost $5,110,000 to feed these men. It will require 10,500 tons of corn and oats to feed these oxen four months in the year, and 10,500 tons of hay. It will require 81,760 tons of corn and oats and 76,650 tons of hay to feed these horses. The value of these horses and cattle is about $6,650,000. These horses and cattle have to be renewed once in four years.

Now, you strike the tariff from lumber of, say, $2 per thousand feet on 3,500,000,000 feet, and you destroy this home market to the farmers of Wisconsin and the adjoining States to an amount equal to an annual sale of horses and oxen of $1,662,500; also for 92,260 tons of corn and oats; also of 87,150 tons of hay; also of $1,662,500 worth of meats, flour, potatoes, beans, butter, cheese, &c., consumed annually by the persons engaged in this branch of manufacturing; and when you have thus paralyzed this industry, the wheels of our mills cease to revolve, when the sound of the ax and the saw are no longer heard, and our smokeless chimneys stand as monuments of our stupidity, then you will have accomplished the grand and thrilling "horizontal" feat of becoming dependent on a foreign market—with a people who care nothing for our national prosperity—for your supply of lumber, while our forests, penetrated as they are by railroads and settlers, will be rapidly destroyed by fires, hurricanes and other natural causes.

But you ask, why can not we make a paying business of producing lumber as cheap as Canada? I answer we can; but we can only do it by a terrible sacrifice somewhere. The pine timber standing costs us at least $2 per thousand feet more than theirs. Our taxes are much higher. We pay more for horses, cattle, and all kinds of provisions than they do. We pay from 75 to 100 per cent. more for wages than they do. We feed our men better than the laborers are fed anywhere else on earth, and as we can not change the items of cost of stumpage or of taxes so as to make them equal, the only way we can successfully compete with them, unaided by a protective tariff, is to bring wages down even lower than theirs and adopt the "pea-soup" regimen upon which their men so largely subsist; and I have already tried to point out that to thus degrade the American citizen and voter would be inhuman, unpatriotic, and suicidal.

But failing to do either of these, what follows? This army of 105,000 consumers of agricultural products would find their "avocation gone," and they would of necessity be hurled into the ranks of agriculturists, thus decreasing the demand and increasing the supply of the goods he has for sale, destroying his home market and compelling him to transport his products hundreds of miles to find a consumer. The only reason that an acre of land within thirty miles of New York city is worth more than an acre of land in Wisconsin is that the one is so near the consumer that the transportation between the two is so slight as to be almost imperceptible, while in the other case the cost of transportation added to the cost of production is barely covered by the price at the place of market, and because there are many cheap, heavy, and bulky products that will not bear the cost of transportation at all. I have in my possession abundant evidence, based upon more than a third of a century of active experience in the lumber and agricultural branches of business that the price of farm products and the scale of wages appreciate or depreciate exactly as the price of lumber goes up or down.

I have thus far spoken mainly of but the effect that protection has upon one State and upon two branches of industry; but when you come to apply the principles to all the States and all the creative industry of our whole country it is to me a matter of astonishment that men could be misled by the false light presented by those who would make exceptionally good English statesmen, but who fit very awkwardly into an American Congress.

But it is urged that this bill should pass for the purpose of reducing our revenues. Why should we reduce our revenues? We owe a national debt of about $1,400,000,000. We owe the Indians a large sum, and I say without fear of successful contradiction that in honor and equity we owe our soldiers more than the revenues of a decade at the present rate of a million a day. Men will prate for a reduction of revenue and then pare down the appropriations for the postal service so as to very seriously cripple that service by making it impossible to carry intelligence of passing events to a people who are anxious to be served at their own cost.

Men will prate of reduction in the face of the fact that we have no navy or means of coast defense but such as would and does excite the ridicule of the civilized world. A fourth-class vessel of a fourth-class power could to-day steam up the Potomac and bombard the Capitol or sail into the port of New York and destroy the city; and yet men will subject the national property and national honor to all these risks, with no other hope than to get up a cheap reputation for an economy they never have and are not to-day practicing. "Reduce the revenue," when of our fifty millions of people there are over one-eighth of the whole number who can neither read nor write; in the face of the fact that our whole governmental system rests upon the intelligence, patriotism, and morality of the people, and no means of lifting this dark pall of ignorance that stands as a permanent menace to our national existence, except by an appropriation from our national revenues.

It is said that while wages are higher here the cost of living is so much greater that the one neutralizes the other. The all-sufficient and conclusive answer to this is that men come here from all the free-trade countries of the world to labor and none go from here to stay there. We should "protect" from all causes that tend to deteriorate the standard of citizenship. The early settlers were made up of the boldest thinkers, most adventurous minds, and the finest specimens of physical manhood of other nations; these mingling and intermixing has resulted in making the American citizen in all that goes to make up a great people the peers if not the superiors of any other nation. But to-day we are in great danger, from coming in contact with a lower type of more recent emigration, of lowering our standard, and such must inevitably be the result of compelling our people to enter into competition with a class of men any one of whom can live a week on a rat.

The following statement of the scale of wages paid to workingmen in manufacturing counties and non-manufacturing counties I think should convince all that the wiser, better, and safer policy is "protection," that it will foster manufactures and create diversified industries; and at the same time it can not fail to convince the farmers that they are not his true friends who denounce the "American system" and argue for "free trade" or tariff for revenue only.

The reader will observe that in every State there is a difference in value of lands in favor of the manufacturing counties, and that where there is little manufacturing there is small difference, and where the products of manufacture are of large value lands bear a high price. That this differentiation may be easily seen the following classification is made:

The following official tables show higher land values in manufacturing counties.

VARIATION BY STATES AND GROUPS.

These States aggregate the value of $5,336,465,954 in products of manufactures, the grand aggregate in 1880 being $5,369,579,191 for all the States and Territories of the United States. Now, the eighteen States and one Territory in the group which has the least manufactures produce a value of $676,427,860, or 12.6 per cent. of the total for the United States, a fraction of 1 per cent. for each State. These may well be considered agricultural States.

The third group includes four States, also essentially agricultural—Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and California—in which there is a quite general determination not to remain in the category of one-idea communities in industrial development. They have $391,585,577 in manufacturing production, or 7.3 per cent. of the grand aggregate for the whole country.

The second group is rounding into symmetry in industry and realizing the benefits of such a status in high prices of lands and farm products, and rapid increase in wealth and culture. This class includes the States north of the Ohio River—Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois—and also Northern New England. These seven States return a production of $1,247,046,686, which is 23.2 per cent. of the whole. These may be deemed industrial as well as agricultural.

But there are seven other States in which the industries are more equally balanced than any other, which make more than half the industrial production of the United States, worth $3,021,405,831, or 56.3 of all. These are found in Southern New England and the Middle States, and may properly be grouped together.

They include all manufacturing production except six-tenths of 1 per cent., scattered through two States and nine Territories. The tabulation by States is as follows:

Aggregate value of products of agriculture by States, acres of land in farms, and value of farm lands, by States and groups of States.

In Wisconsin the lands in the manufacturing counties are valued at $33.88 per acre, and in non-manufacturing counties at $18.60 per acre; difference, $15.28 per acre.

The average wage to farm hands in 1882 was $17.90 per month and board, and in the lumber woods it was $27.90 and board. A difference of $10 per month on 35,000 men would make $350,000 per month, or $4,200,000 per annum, or $120 for each man per annum.

And in the face of these facts and figures these men who oppose "protection" would have the farmer, when he is protected to the extent of—apples, 10 per cent. ad valorem; garden seeds, except sugar-beet, 20 per cent. ad valorem; beef and pork, 1 cent per pound; hams and bacon, 2 cents per pound; lard, 2 cents per pound; butter and cheese, 4 cents per pound; wheat, 20 cents per bushel; corn, rye, oats, and barley, each 10 cents per bushel; barley, patent or hulled, ½ cent per pound; oatmeal and rye-flour, each ½ cent per pound; wheat flour, 20 per cent. ad valorem; potato or corn starch, 2 cents per pound; all other starch, 2½ cents per pound; cleaned rice, 2½ cents per pound; hay, $2 per ton; hops, 8 cents per pound; potatoes, 15 cents per bushel; milk, preserved or condensed, 20 per cent. ad valorem; and when official figures prove that manufacturing enhances the value of his land over 100 per cent. in addition to all the advantages it affords him of a home market, I say they would lure him by the seductive song of "tariff for revenue only" to lend his political influence to the advancement of a theory the tendency of which is to bring them to the condition that the farmer in France once occupied when he yoked his wife and daughter to the plow.

OVERPRODUCTION.

I do not believe with the gentlemen who say we are overproducing. In my judgment there is in the markets of the world an abundant demand for all our productions, but they are not looked up or sought out. If our foreign ministers and consuls whom we send abroad as the accredited agents of our Government were business men, new markets would be found, new avenues of trade opened up, and a market found for all our products. These men are too often selected from the machine politicians, or are simply divine poets or dreamers, when they should be selected from the boards of trade of our cities, with a greater reference to extending the markets of America than their adaptability to adopt the customs of courts and denationalizing themselves by becoming imitators of customs and rules of etiquette which, while we need not quarrel with, we belittle ourselves by imitating.

Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the bill now being considered we have one more effort to lower the duties now imposed on the foreign producer for the favor of being allowed to sell his products in the United States. Again a thrust is made at the laboring classes of our country. The free-traders of America seem to have a deep-seated enmity toward the people who work. Ever vigilant, wary, and cunning, the free-traders wait, with cool purpose and steady hand, their opportunity to strike labor to the ground, to bring American labor in close competition with the starvation prices of Europe and Asia. It develops the old fight, the self-constituted aristocrat against the unpresuming plebeian. Emanating, as it does, from aristocratical ideas, we could hardly expect the theory of free trade to hold anything in common with the toilers of the nation. We all know free trade benefits only the rich. Those who do not need help it helps, while the poor laboring person is ground still closer to the dust. This bill says it is a "bill to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes."

We might say in truth it was for the purpose of crippling the prosperity of many of our industries directly, and all of them indirectly, and for the purpose of favoring foreign laborers, who pay no State, county, or city taxes, nor do they in any way support the United States, but in time of war are our enemies. The free-traders urge the reduction of our tariff because our revenue is too large. I have heard it several times on the floor of this House. Now think of it. A nation in debt (with notes out) considerably over a thousand million dollars, whose political economists say we are getting too much revenue! We have no Navy. The little Republic of Chili could take our capital and all our great cities. Our harbors and rivers are unimproved. Millions ought to be spent on the education of the people, the only way to perpetuate our Republic. American ships should carry our mails to all foreign countries, bringing us in contact with those people. Our pork now goes to France through England and Belgium. The Government owns less than one-tenth of its post-offices, and skins around in the little villages for the cheapest rent. Here is work to be done which would take all our surplus revenue and well repay the nation. In the face of the cry of too much revenue the free-traders insist on keeping the tax on the farmers' product of tobacco.

The bill assumes that a tariff is a tax. So do the free-traders all. A tax on the people is their cry. This is the old howl we have heard ever since a difference of opinion on this subject began. We are told in good earnest the duty is added to the price the consumer ought to pay; the consumer pays the duty. Never was argument more fallacious, false, or more unreasonable. No duty was ever collected from an article, the home production of which became large, under that duty without the price becoming lower to the consumer. The duty thus becomes a benefit and not a tax. Taxes are so often spent foolishly without doing the good they ought, that the very name tax has become hateful. For this reason the free-traders call a tariff a tax in order to reap the benefits of a prejudice. If we could not make the articles we import, if we did not compete, then indeed we would be at the mercy of the foreigners, as we have been in the past, and they could add the duty to the price, which they would surely do; but thanks to a protective tariff we become competitors for our own market, and to-day we are very respectable manufacturers as a nation. We could live comfortably, yes richly, without a foreign ship ever reaching our shores, without buying a foreign production of any kind.

But our learned free-traders ignore the fact that our production competes with the foreign maker and importer, thus forcing him to ask less than he would if we did not produce the same article. This we could not do without either the protective tariff or the low wages of the foreigner and his cheap money. Then our own manufacturers compete with each other, causing a still further decline in prices. Therefore it is plain a protective tariff is a benefit to the nation and not a tax to the people.

A gentleman of my acquaintance, a man of worth and standing, who spent some months in England and Scotland, was told by several of the most intelligent manufacturers there that they thought tariff duties were paid to a great extent by the English producer and not by the consumer in America. The feeling in England is that the higher the duties they encounter the lower they had to sell, and the less they could pay their labor, to make a profit on their business. They said we sell as cheaply now to the French as we did before they increased their duties, and we know we pay the duties, and not the French consumer of the goods.

Messrs. John & James Dobson, of Philadelphia, among the largest makers of blankets, give an instance—they could give many. A gentleman bought a five-pound blanket in England, paying $4.45 for it. Our duties were then $4.90, making the total cost of the English blanket $9.35. The same blanket—weight, size, stripes, and all—could have been bought at home for $5.20, 75 cents more than the English product. But we must remember if there were no blankets made in America we must pay very much more for the English blanket. Our competition had brought down the price of the English article.

Besides all this, the work of the American blanket was done in America; sheep-growers, herdsmen, shearers, spinners, weavers, the makers of machinery both iron and wood, coal-diggers, engineers, iron-workers, ore-diggers, clerks, &c., all had a hand in this American blanket, and they spent their wages in America. They paid the farmer for flour, bacon, and all he raises, not forgetting his tobacco. The doctor, preacher, lawyer, all got some of these wages. The State, county, and city taxes were paid in America. The railroads, hotels, &c., got their full share. How much of this kind of thing did the men who made the English blanket do for America? Taxes increase the price because our own citizens pay them; a tariff reduces the price because it is paid by foreigners, and stimulates home competition and keeps our gold at home. The effect of a tariff may not be felt in a day or a year, but it will not be long before its beneficial results will be seen.

Washington, Jefferson, Clay, Jackson, Webster, and Lincoln did not think a tariff a tax. The president of the German commission to our centennial exposition said in his report: "The present condition of American manufactures shows the fallacy of the free-trade doctrine, that the productions of a country are raised in price by protective duties." And the German Empire is to-day enforcing protective duties. Napoleon created the best sugar industry in the world for France after years of subsidizing, protective tariffs, and even prohibition of imports. At first sugar was high, but how fully have the people been recompensed, repaid. Now they not only make their own sugar, hundreds of thousands of tons of cheap, good sugar, but they export it. And to-day France is enforcing a protective tariff. The history of tariffs is the same in England. Woolens and iron were highly protected for years, and the prices grew cheaper up to the time they tried to make the world believe they were free-traders.

Spool-cotton illustrates the effects of protection. For years the English had control of our market, asserting that the consumer paid the duty. Our competition reduces the price 25 per cent. After several more years of competition the price has been reduced fully 50 per cent. and we find we have control of our own market, saving $3,000,000 per year to the people in price besides establishing a prosperous industry in our own country, and keeping our money at home, eating the farmers' products, paying State, county, and city taxes, &c. All this was done while a high protective tariff was levied on spool-cotton. It is worse than idle to say a tariff is a tax.

Cotton goods we used to import at 50 cents a yard before we had cotton mills have since been exported at 6 cents per yard. The price of cotton hosiery has been reduced nearly one-half since 1860. Delaines we imported in 1860 at 35 cents per yard have been made in America and sold for 20 cents per yard, the purchaser getting a better article than that imported. Standard sheetings, drillings, bleached shirtings, prints, print-cloths are all fully 25 to 50 per cent. cheaper per yard in 1882 than in 1860, and to-day, in place of importing all our domestic ginghams, as we did a very few years since, we make them in America of better quality and cheaper than we can buy elsewhere. The fact is you can buy many kinds of cotton goods as cheap in America as any place in the world. The reduction in the prices I have just referred to is directly attributable to the protective tariffs imposed or adopted in July, 1861, and afterward. How shallow, then, seems the assertion that the natural price of an article is the American price after taking off the duty.

Up to March, 1883, the duty on standard sheetings was 57 per cent.; the price of such sheetings was 8 cents per yard. Take the duty, 57 per cent., from the cost, 8 cents, and you have 3.40 cents per yard the price according to free-trade reasoning. But 3.40 is less than half the price you would have to pay any place; therefore it is seen again the tariff is not a tax on the consumer, because we have seen the prices steadily decrease, although a high protective tariff was imposed.

The same experience has attended our silk industry. We are producing about thirty-five million dollars' worth per year, paying good prices to the operatives. We have reached some degree of excellence in making silk. Our machine-twist silk on spools is superior to the French or Italian silk, although they have had many years' experience. For years our silk-makers have had the closest foreign competition, but strange to say, while the duty was 40 per cent. during the last twenty years, the price has decreased 30 per cent. and the quality of the silk has improved, the money kept in this country, and hundreds of people found good wages for work. Wool stands in the same relation to a tariff. During our low tariff from 1850 to 1860 the increase in the number of our sheep was only 3½ per cent., while during the ten years of protective tariff, from 1870 to 1880, the gain was 43 per cent., and the wool from these sheep was all bought by American mills, the wool amounting to over $100,000,000. We had six hundred and sixty-eight woolen-mills in the West and seven hundred and ninety-four in the East. Shall we allow this great industry to be crippled by lowering the tariff? In the face of a protective tariff prices of wool goods gradually and constantly decreased, became cheaper fully 25 per cent. The lower grades of wool goods are made better in America than abroad, and if you consider their quality they are cheaper than those made in foreign countries. Fine broadcloths may now be cheaper abroad, but the universal history is, as you build up home competition the prices of home products and the foreign article go down. One of the United States consuls in Ireland reports:

Cheap clothing in the United States is cheaper than here. Ireland has enjoyed free trade with England for eighty years, her wool-mills are about destroyed, and her people pay more for common clothing than the Americans do with their tariff for protection.

In 1880 $46,000,000 was paid for the manufacture of wool, which produced two hundred and thirty-four and a half-million dollars' worth of fabrics. We have increased our wool product in the last forty years over $200,000,000, and it is the fear of further increase in that direction that sends the cry across the water from England, "A tariff is a tax," to be taken up and reiterated by our wise men who favor low tariffs. I say again, will we cripple the prosperity of this great industry? No.

Mr. John Roach says that several kinds of iron of which he buys largely, such as ship plates, angle-iron, bolts, rivets, and other irons have been 25 per cent. cheaper from 1870 to 1880 than from 1850 to 1860, the former during a protective period of tariff, the latter during a revenue tariff. For twenty years before we commenced to make steel we bought English steel at 16 and 18 cents per pound.

After our protective tariff our people commenced making steel, and the price soon came down to 13 and 15 cents per pound. During the latter part of the late war our steel sold for 32 cents, while the English asked 45 cents. It is dangerous to depend on a foreign country for your supplies in time of war. The English sell steel cheaper to America than to any other country, the idea being to break down our steel industry; and between the English and our tariff tinkers this great plant begins to stagger; it may soon fall. Bessemer steel rails were not made in this country in large quantities before 1870, although the manufacture was commenced in 1867; up to this time the English controlled the market, charging us $150 per ton for rails, in gold—not greenbacks—no; they spurned them. Even the spurious Englishman, the Canadian, would not have greenbacks. In 1870 our protected competition had reduced the price of rails to $50.37, gold, in England, equal to $57.93 in our currency. These prices allowed the English to lay down steel rails in New York for $63 per ton, currency. Since that time our mills have furnished the country with over 3,000,000 tons at an average cost of $59 per ton, our currency, and during the last two years large quantities could have been bought at less than $40 per ton. This rail manufacture employs over 20,000 American workmen, to whom is paid seven and a half million dollars as wages. Is it not better to pay this large sum to American workmen than to pay it to English workmen?

During the winter of 1879–'80 the representatives of 24,000 miles of railroad petitioned Congress for the retention of the duty on rails, being sensible of the benefits the protective tariff had been in reducing the price of rails. During the period between 1850 and 1860 the English sold us large quantities of iron rails, brittle and of little worth. They charged us $50 per ton. Now we buy American steel rails for less than $40 per ton.

We now see in the steel industry that our tariff fostered and made it possible for us to make steel rails; that we thus established a great industry, and that such rails became cheaper all the time as we advanced in their manufacture; and were we to stop making rails, soon the price would go up; but in the face of all these facts, our astutes still cry a tariff is a tax.

The manufactures of cut nails show the same principle. Before America invented cut nails we used those made by hand. They sold readily for 25 cents per pound, and were largely imported, our money going out for them. In 1824 the duty on all nails was put at 5 cents per pound. This duty was maintained for years. In four years, or 1823, nails were sold at 8 cents per pound. In 1830, 1835, 1840, 1844, 1846 they ranged from 5 to 6 cents per pound, and within a few years I have seen them sold for 2 cents per pound. It must be noted that in 1830, six years after the duty of 5 cents per pound had been arranged, the nails were sold at the exact amount of the duty, 5 cents per pound, to the consumer. In 1833 the price fell befow the duty; in 1842 the price was 2 cents per pound below the duty. Now, who paid the duties? Think of it. Were they a tax on the consumer? Was the duty added to the price?

This same experience attaches to all our industries. We used to pay English makers from $16 to $20 per dozen for saws we now make for $10 and $11 per dozen. The same story attends axes, shovels, cutlery, and, indeed, all the articles we can make. Thus it is again proven that as we protect the manufacture in our own country the prices are reduced to the consumer and the quality is much improved, and our gold kept at home.

In 1877 we imported only 75,804 ounces of quinine with a protective tariff. The duty was taken off quinine; the importation of it steadily increased, until in 1883 we imported 1,055,764 ounces, and our manufacturers of quinine are moving to Germany because they can make it cheaper there. This is one of the triumphs of free trade. This will be the end of our wool, silk, iron, sugar, and other industries if low tariffs or free trade prevail.

This Morrison bill proposes to take the duty off salt, to make it cheaper. I pity the man who wants salt cheaper. Within the last six months I have seen good salt in barrels of 280 pounds shipped one hundred miles by water, hauled up the Ohio River bank, put on cars and taken forty miles by railroad, and put down to the merchant for 90 cents per barrel. The prices at the Western places of production have been from $1.80 in 1866 to 74 cents per barrel in 1882. Who wants salt cheaper? Not the dairyman, because he sells his cheap salt in his dear butter. If the tariff is taken off the result will be the already tottering salt industry will fall, then prices of the imported will go up, and our gold will go out, without paying State, county, or city taxes.

In 1878 a French senatorial commission for the purpose of examining their foreign trade visited America, and in their report said:

A veritable economical revolution has taken place in the United States under the shelter of the prohibition system. They have organized a powerful industry, which rivals England in cheapness.

Thus speaks a man who certainly had no prejudices in our favor, and thought he was speaking the truth. In Canada the people tell their government how they have to pay the duties on wheat, wool, coal, lumber, &c., that they sell in the United States; here our wise men say we have to pay it; the Canadian knows. Shall we send abroad nearly $45,000,000 wages we pay our shoemakers and the hundreds of millions we pay other workers in our factories because we can buy a little cheaper? If we do, how are we to get these millions back? Had we not best keep the money in our own country? Then we have a chance to get it.

A short time since I heard a gentleman say on the floor of this House, "No good woolens are made in America." This is a common assertion among free-traders, and one of their excuses for buying the foreign article. The French commissioner to our centennial exhibition in 1876 was an expert in wool manufacture. In his report to his government he says:

The Americans can justly claim a very large share in the progress attained in woolens at the present day, and this progress especially in staple goods for general consumption has done serious injury to the markets of France and England. We are forced to admit that our manufactures of Vienna and of Bischwiller—can no longer compete either in cost or quality with the goods of this American company—

Famed French mills—

Globe Woolen Company.

These and other mills make beautiful goods, as any merchant will tell you. For honest wear a great many American brands are excellent, and are often sold for imported goods. The enemies of our industries have succeeded in the past in making our people believe our goods were not as good as foreign fabrics, and we have gone from home to buy a poorer article than we had at home.

The prejudice of our people against American goods comes from the assertions of free-traders, oft repeated, that nothing could be made in America as good as goods made abroad, and from ignorance on the subject. We are told by lawyers who never were in a wool-mill that we can not make good cloths. Now we prefer the evidence of the French expert to his government to any evidence given us by a college professor or trained lawyer, whose school of learning in this line consists of a knowledge of cloths they have bought to wear. We have made great strides in making cloths. Let us foster the industry until we learn to make the finest and best in the world, and, as is the natural end of protection, the cheapest. Think of the thousands of laborers connected with the wool industries, from the shepherd to the tailor. Think of the millions of money invested in its different branches, paying out in 1883 $70,000,000 for work.

The absurdity of the cry, "Tariff is a tax," is fully demonstrated by applying to the farm-products the tariff. There is nothing the farmer produces that is not protected except eggs, and they are the only thing a farmer produces that are unreasonably high. Now, does any one suppose wheat is 20 cents per bushel higher than it would be if the tariff of that amount was taken off; does any one believe that the 200,000 bushels of potatoes imported in 1870, on which a duty of 15 cents per bushel was laid, increased the price of our 250,000,000 bushels potatoes, raised here, 15 cents per bushel? No one believes it. Yet this is free-trade doctrine.

This bill permits foreign hay to come in free of duty, while our farmers have thousands of tons on hand they can not sell. How these tariff reformers do love the honest farmer! The effort of all free-traders is to make the farmer believe they as consumers pay the duties. For a time they succeeded, but experience has taught the farmer better. They have seen that as manufactories sprang up near them they had a better market at their doors than they formerly had at a distance of hundreds of miles. And they know the more mechanics or non-producers there are near them the better the market they have. They, the farmers, also see that while they sell for good prices, their clothing, and in fact all they want to buy, is at reasonable rates and getting cheaper each year. Thus it is, as we have shown, it is to the farmer's interest to have a protective tariff, keeping in prosperous condition our factories, and in fact the whole country. No class of people are better patrons of the farmer than the hard-working manufacturer. He uses more tobacco and other products of the farmer per capita than any other class. As a class they do hard work, get good pay, and live generously.

I have seen in a manufacturing district in my own State hundreds of barrels of flour from distant agricultural States, large quantities of potatoes from the Northwest, proving that the more non-producers of grain we have the better it is for the farmer. Let us compare the purchasing power of the farmer's products during the low-tariff period prior to 1860 with the period since, during which protective tariffs prevailed. We find that the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat, corn, oats, a pound of butter, cheese, wool, tobacco, or anything the farmer raises is double during protection what it was during low tariffs. For instance, a pound of cheese would buy under free trade 4.74 pounds of salt; under protection it would buy 13.76 pounds of salt, and so with calico and almost anything else. This is the true valuation: how much will the farmer's products buy?

The railroad freights from Chicago to New York on wheat averaged during 1880 19¼ cents per bushel. Now, if there was a diversity of employment throughout the States this 20 cents freight could largely be saved to the farmer. In place of selling in New York he would sell at home. Professor Nimmo, the statistician, says none of the manufacturing States export their agricultural products. Take the great State of Pennsylvania, for instance. She consumes all her products and produces about enough to supply her people. She produced in 1880 19,500,000 bushels of wheat, 46,000,000 bushels corn, 34,000,000 bushels oats, besides large amounts of rye, buckwheat, potatoes, &c., and sold it all at home, thus saving the 20 cents transportation the Minnesota farmer pays to New York. Twenty cents per bushel is a snug profit.

This is true prosperity. Now, suppose the State of Iowa had manufacturing establishments sufficient to consume her products of agriculture, she would more than save the 20 cents freight to New York, because a home market is better than a city market. Iowa has vast capacity for the manufacture of sugar of different grades. Her climate suits both the Chinese sugar-cane and the sugar-beet. It is now well known that Chinese cane will do well wherever corn grows well, and this cane is rich in sugar.

And yet, in the face of Professor Nimmo's statement that manufacturing States did not export grain and provisions and that the other States did export grain and provisions, and that the State of Pennsylvania sold her agricultural and provision products at home because of her large amount of manufacturers, or non-producers of grain—in view of all this, I say, apparently sensible men will ask you what benefit is the tariff to the farmer.

The United States exported last year eight hundred and four and a quarter million dollars' worth. Seventy-seven per cent. of this were the products of agriculture, coming in direct competition with the low-priced labor of India and Russia, which is paid only a few cents per day. We could not compete with this labor if they were not farther from market than we are, their charge being on one bushel from 50 to 75 cents. Besides, they have none of our agricultural machinery. They farm as people did two thousand years ago. But they are fast coming up with us, and we must soon consider the Pennsylvania plan of having a market at home. Our farmers can not live like the naked and starving East Indians, nor like the serfs of Russia. Ninty-four per cent. of our exports of provisions and breadstuffs come from the West, where little manufacturing is done.

In 1840 each farmer had in the United States five persons who did not farm to buy of him; in 1880 each farmer had seven persons to buy of him who did not produce agricultural products. The farmer knows his prices depend on how much he has to sell and how many there are to buy of him. We see he had nearly 50 per cent. more people to buy of him in 1880 than he had in 1840. Why is this so? Simply because for nearly twenty years before 1880 the manufactories had been stimulated to exertion by a protective tariff, and there was a demand for workmen in the factories, and they worked in factories in place of on farms. Had not this been the case the natural increase and emigration would have given us 3,000,000 more farmers than we did have in 1880, increasing the farmer's product that much. Benjamin Franklin wrote to Chief-Justice Marshall saying every manufacture encouraged in our country makes part of a market for provisions within ourselves, and saves so much money to the country.

But we are still told a tariff does the farmer no good. The cotton crop increased in quantity about 33 per cent. between 1860 and 1880; the price went up about 2 per cent.; the foreign demand only increasing 2¼ per cent., while the home demand increased 86 per cent., while prices for the manufactured article decreased 50 per cent. These facts prove the benefits of a home market, namely, price of raw cotton increased, price of manufactured goods reduced, and the home demand nearly doubled. The export of cotton has scarcely any increase since 1866, because a market at home demanded it at better prices and less trouble than attended foreign trade. There are 341 cotton-mills in the Southern States, producing from thirty-five to forty million dollars' worth of goods. Furnaces, rolling-mills, and nail-factories are springing up in the South. As people see and experience the benefits of diversity of employment they drop free-trade notions, turning their backs to the theorists who know nothing in practice. Therefore the South is not so strongly free trade as formerly.

If the American workingman is so much abused by our tariff as the free-traders proclaim, why do workers come to us in great numbers to stay and work? They come from all countries, and the Canadian papers seem to be alarmed at the number of workingmen leaving Canada for the United States. If the American workman is suffering from the effects of protective tariffs, as free-traders say, why do we go abroad to buy a quarter million tons pig-iron, a quarter million tin plates, steel rails, bar-iron, &c., all of which Americans would be glad to make? Why do we import a half million tons iron ore dug by foreign labor, thus making our labor in America still less, and now you try to reduce the price of labor still more by reducing the tariff to allow still further importations of goods made in foreign lands? No, Mr. Free-trader, you do not like the laborer, and your actions prove it.

Compare our workman with those of Europe; there you know him by his dress, here you do not. The European gets about half what the American does for work, and the English farm-laborer's condition is poor in the extreme. We hear it said the European lives so much cheaper he can afford to work cheaper. The truth is, because he works so cheap he is compelled to live cheap. Our worker lives like a nabob compared with the European. I have taken the retail markets of two manufacturing cities in England, Oldham and Manchester, and carefully compared them with those of the United States, and find their prices fully as high as ours. These items comprise sixty-six articles, from coffee to blackberries. I subjoin the list. The clothes our workmen wear can not be bought cheaper in England. Shoes, calico, hosiery, muslins, hats, caps, axes, shovels, spades, cutlery, furniture, clocks, common woolen apparel, pots, pans, kettles, and provisions are as cheap in the United States as in England.

General Jackson said: Where has the American farmer a market for his surplus products? Except for cotton he has neither a foreign nor a home market. Nothing is more true than the trite saying that the farmer needs the mechanic to buy his products and the mechanic needs the farmer to buy his wares. Leaving out cotton and tobacco, we have enough mechanics to consume our agricultural products except one-tenth, and at the rate we were growing up to March, 1883, that one-tenth would have been taken up in a few years. What the country most needs is a stable, unchanging policy as to tariffs. A continuous change unsettles business, produces general uneasiness, and is unconvincing to thousands as to which policy is correct.

The mere introduction of this imperfect bill has done a great deal of harm. Who demanded further reduction of tariffs? Not the mass of the people, I assure you; the people are for protective tariffs. No one called for this measure except the paid agents of English manufacturers, English and American importers, and the theorists.

But the advocates of this bill have made a departure. Formerly the low-tariff theorists were willing to have protection as an incident, but these later-day plunderers will have none of it; no protection for them. Either intentionally or accidentally, these aggressive advocates of free trade seem sincere. Some of them do not like to be called free-traders, but they always levy duties in the interest of free trade and never in the interest of protection. They say, and doubtless honestly, the end will not be reached violently, but nevertheless we will reach it, namely, free trade. And if we do reach free trade, then comes the prices for labor and the manner of living enjoyed by the workingmen of Europe, where a very large portion of the operatives live with their families in one room, often five and six persons in a room. Besides the discomfort, this crowding together tends to disease, and the statistics go to prove it, showing that nine-tenths of the deaths from fever occur among this crowded population. While their house room is of the most scanty dimensions, the food is of the plainest kind and reduced to a small variety, meat forming a very small part of subsistence. This is still worse in Belgium, this kingdom rivaling England in cheap production; consequently, being her rival in cheap labor.

A few years since the secretary of the interior for Belgium said in his report to the government that the long-continued low price of labor and consequent low or poor living had caused the race to go back, to deteriorate; that the Belgians were not as strong mentally or physically as formerly." Think of this people who fought successfully the most powerful nation on earth (for freedom of thought) being finally brought to grief by hard work, poor living, and poor pay. In Europe women perform all kinds of labor, from carrying the hod to the top of the house or striking in the blacksmith-shop to currying the horses.

In Italy, where the people are remarkably free from intemperance, their wages are less than half the amount the American is paid. The Italian workman lives in a miserable house; his provisions cost as much as if he lived in America; he is forced to eat less. For breakfast he simply drinks a cup of poor coffee; at noon beans cooked in olive-oil or lard, or in place of this corn-meal, boiled or fried, with a small amount of wine, is eaten; at 6 p. m. to the above is added salt fish or salt pork, with vegetables. Fresh meat is very rarely eaten, and macaroni, which we have thought the standard national dish, is really beyond the reach of the poor, and is only to be had by the comparatively rich. These are the habits we must come to if we undertake to rival Europe in prices.

How insincere the tears the free-traders shed for the laboring man. He knows who his friends are. He knows when you send a dollar to England to buy it does not furnish him work, but does give work to the Englishman. That dollar is lost to the workingman of America forever, and he knows it.

Our home market consumes fourteen-fifteenths of the fifteen thousand millions produced by our various industries, showing the benefits to be derived from home trade. We import $33,000,000 worth of hemp, jute, and flax. Why not raise it on our farms and keep this industry at home? We import $15,000,000 of linen goods. Both these items need protection. We can produce all these items as well as foreign nations. The linen industry of England was developed under the most stringent, vigorous, and extreme protection. This is all we need. At first the goods may be high, but soon competition at home and abroad will reduce the price, well repaying the nation.

We do now hear the distant thunder of our workingmen because these English, these Belgians, and these Italians are brought here to free America under contract (their passage-money being advanced) to work at cheap rates, which is to them a mine of wealth. Is it economy, political, moral, or any other kind, that we should try to force our workingman to the level of these poor foreigners, who after centuries of oppression, of poor living, and poor pay have come to look upon their lot as the normal condition of man? They can not realize a workingman owning his home, living on the best the market affords, dressing on holidays as well as any one, reading a daily newspaper, and being a man of influence.

As all observing persons know, the habits, surroundings, and manner of living greatly influence the character of a people. The Americans are the greatest people on earth, because they are healthy and free; they think as they please and do their own thinking; they live well; the brain as well as the body is fed by nutritious and stimulating food; they live in roomy and pleasant houses, and they feel they are as good as any one. All these blessings are caused by good wages produced by the protective tariff. Our people are not deteriorating; they are not going back or retrograding; they are marching forward, and our cry is "Onward!" Free trade puts us on a level with Europe. We believe in laws being made for the good of the majority of the people, 90 per cent. of whom are workers. No free trade for us. We are glad to see a very strong and intelligent protective party springing up in England, which will soon give the capitalist of England as much trouble as the tariff party of America.

John Stuart Mill said of the free-trade idea that it was "an assumption founded on sentiment," and the practical advocates of tariffs, those who have experienced the benefits of protection to the nation and themselves, know what they mean when they talk. The theorist of the office or college does not. They are the persons with the assumption founded on sentiment. We fear our people do not realize the value of our home market. Leaving out cotton and tobacco, over 90 per cent. of the agricultural products of the United States is consumed at home, and the sure way to prevent the agricultural crisis the croakers predict is to encourage the non-producers of grain and thereby consume the 8 or 10 per cent. we now send abroad.

Do foreign nations buy of us because they love us? Look at the spirit displayed by France and England during our late war. They and others gloried in our destruction. No; they buy from us because it is economy to do so. Whenever it ceases to be economical to buy of us, that moment we lose their trade. There is no sentiment in it, but purely a matter of dollars and cents. If we do debase ourselves enough to buy carpets for the White House in England, if we do buy carpets for rooms in the Capitol building of the English, and go to France to buy the dishes for the President's table, the English and French do not buy our wheat, cotton, or tobacco any quicker. No; they buy of us for economy; and we know they are doing their utmost to become independent of us, which they will accomplish before many years. The wheat and the cotton of the Indies already puts in its appearance against its western rival, America. And when the English have created cheap transportation to and from India, good-by to our wheat traffic with England. Our farmers can not compete with the miserable, starving, naked farmer of India. Then let us while we may construct new markets at home.

Such bills as we now have to consider gladden the hearts of the English exporters and manufacturers. The London Iron and Coal Trade, a prominent newspaper, says:

> We can not sell iron at a profit in the United States owing to the very low price of native iron, but the most satisfactory news is that on Monday Mr. MORRISON, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, introduced another tariff bill in the House of Representatives. Considering that it was only last year that a tariff bill was passed which considerably reduced the duties on a large number of articles, the introduction of another bill so soon affords a sign that the protection doctrine is a good deal played out. Mr. MORRISON and his colleagues who have drawn up the bill have shown their wisdom in placing on the free-list a number of raw materials, such as copper and iron ores, slack, coal, and salt.

This is the way the English exporter talks. It pleases them to think protection is on the wane in America. Any one who reads English papers will testify they always are exceeding glad at the prospect of a reduction in the tariff.

If our free-traders say truly that the tariff is simply added to the price and the consumer pays it, why should these English be so much interested? They would know there was no money out of their pockets; they simply added the duty to the price. But the English resort to ever conceivable device, both fair and foul, to accomplish the reduction of our tariffs. Money is spent in profusion on newspapers that sell themselves for the ruin of their country; clubs are organized; immense numbers of tracts are distributed; for years college professors have been bought to teach the political economy of free trade, and it is a rare thing to find one who does not teach it. British gold has been spent in profusion for years to make America a farming country to buy England's manufactures. The English know they pay the tariff; therefore their fearful kicking. Our whisky men who do add the tax to the price do not grumble about it; nothing goes out of their pockets. How different they act compared with the English exporter.

America seems to be a good place to trade in, and if an Englishman or Frenchman wants to sell goods here we charge him so much license for the privilege, because he does not agree to become an American soldier if we need one; nor does he pay any city, county, or State tax, and is of no use whatever to the United States. This license is called a tariff. Some want a very low tariff or none at all, while others want a tariff sufficient to keep our laborers on good pay and diet. The friends of this bill say they want to reduce the tariff because the revenue is too large; but they refuse to abolish an internal tax on the people, which is quite distasteful.

We are constantly referred to England for example by free-traders. You would think they were all English to hear them talk. But England raises one hundred million of her revenue by charges at her custom-house, which they call custom revenue. We call it tariff. This custom revenue protects many of their products, and is applied to more than fifty articles, and for all that they claim to be free-traders. They collect one hundred and thirty-four millions by excise-tax, sixty millions by stamps, fifteen millions by land-tax, property, income-tax, sixty millions; from post-office, thirty-five millions; telegraph, nine millions. So it seems the English people pay an internal tax of three hundred and thirty-five millions, her total revenue being four hundred and forty-five millions.

You see plainly our free-traders have taken the English idea: Hold on to the internal tax, the tax on the citizen of America, but let up on the English citizen; do not tax him! True, he is no earthly use to America, he is her sworn enemy, but do not tax him; but the poor devil of an American, who pays all the taxes and who risks his life for the Government, tax him! The English admit that while the labor on an article made in England is only 52 per cent. of its cost, it amounts to 73 per cent. in America. English statisticians say this. We think it is safe to say that the cost of everything produced in America for sale in market is composed of 75 per cent. labor.

Therefore labor represents a very large majority in everything, not only mechanical products, but agricultural products. Labor composes a large majority in the cost of all things, from the broken stone on the road to the Treasury note.

Therefore it is very plain that a reduction of prices means a reduction of labor. It can not be concealed, it can not be denied. We know a reduction of tariffs is an approach toward close competition with English labor, and must mean a reduction in price of American labor. Shall we do it? By our protective system we have arrived at a state of wealth, prosperity, and influence possessed by no other nation. Our common people live as no other people do. Free trade means the curtailment of this happy state of affairs. If we keep our gold in America we each have a chance to get it; if we send it abroad for goods it is gone from us forever.

Therefore I appeal to the workers of the United States—and I mean any person who must do something for a living, from the stone-breaker to the lady who counts Treasury notes—to look this question square in the face, to think for themselves, and to say what they think. It seems to me a very simple question. Protection to American industries causes general prosperity, not of a part but of the whole United States, because it diversifies the employment of the people and keeps our gold in America—at home.

We have seen that a tariff is not a tax; that it is not added to the price the consumer ought to pay; that the country has been uniformly prosperous with protective tariffs and the reverse with low tariffs. A very few years since cut nails were sold at 2 cents per pound and less, while the tariff was 1½ cents per pound. No one will believe this tariff of 1½ cents per pound was included in the price of the nails sold at 2 cents per pound. Is a tariff a tax on the people?

To protect the American workingman is patriotic; to prefer the English or French workman is the reverse. Our workman is our soldier; he fights the battles of the nation; he gives life and energy to the business and concerns of humanity. Imagine an American army of free-traders, English agents, college professors, lawyers, superannuated clergymen, and importers! Are they not a bold set of men? And yet they are all the classes that muster under that banner of free trade. I warn free-traders to be careful how they press the worker; he knows that free trade benefits only the rich at the expense of the poor. Turn to the history of Italy, Spain, and Mexico, reduced to beggary by long years of free trade. As they awake, one by one, from their sleep, they commence prosperity and advancement by adopting a system of protective tariffs.

Turkey, India, and Ireland are fit representatives of free trade; their manufactures are tumbling to the ground, their people have become the most miserable of agriculturists, with no national life or energy left of a once mighty people. Think of the splendors of India of the past, the once powerful Turk, and the happy Ireland! Where are their glories now? Where turn to find their wealth and power of former years? We answer, look in the treasuries of the robber nation of the earth, false and perfidious England, who, under the guise of a Christian nation, has committed all the crimes in the calendar of crimes. This same England brought these nations from opulence and power to degradation and vassalage by compelling them to practice the system of free trade. England and her agents now seek to do the same thing with America. Beware of English influences, supremely selfish, insincere, and greedy. They are to be feared. Let no American be so unpatriotic as to preach free trade. Let no American so far forget his country as to seek her destruction in this way.

APPENDIX.

PURCHASING POWER OF THE FARMER—A COMPARISON.

The average prices of seven leading farm products and of seven leading manufactured articles on the imports of which duties are levied, for five free trade or revenue tariff years and for five protective tariff years, are given in the following tables, prepared by Hon. JONATHAN CHACE, M. C., of Rhode Island. He took his prices from a report of Hon. Mr. Burchard, of Illinois (a free trader), from the New York Journal of Commerce (free trade), and from the Philadelphia Prices Current of Iron:

Let us see what the farmer's articles would buy in the market:

The above tables were furnished the American consul at Manchester, England, by George Lord, esq. president of the Manchester chamber of commerce, and are the result of most reliable and pains-taking inquiries, and are very valuable statistics.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the problem of the revival of the foreign shipping interests of this country during this Congress, I have been forcibly impressed with the intimate bearing upon this important subject of the principles of free trade and protection. We shall find in the decline of American foreign shipping interests one of the most striking illustrations extant of the effects of free trade and one of the most forcible admonitions against allowing the predominance of England's wishes and ideas concerning our home policy.

The question of the revival of American ship-building is one of great practical importance. In 1826 over 92 per cent. of American commerce was carried in American bottoms; in 1837, 82 per cent.; in 1848, 77 per cent.; and in 1855, 75 per cent. was thus carried. The latter was the year when our foreign shipping interests were at their height, after which a gradual decline occurred, accelerating rapidly during the rebellion and continuing till 1881, when only 16 per cent. of the American commerce was carried in American bottoms. From 1855 we find a rapid decline in the building of vessels for the foreign trade. In that year we built 507 vessels; in 1856, 463; in 1857, 307; in 1859, 107. Let us not, however, be misled as to the import of these figures. The American flag decreasing in size in the ratio of this decrease of percentage from 1855 to the present as frequently pictured is misleading. The American flag, excepting relatively, has hardly been shrinking. When you compare the tonnage of 1856 with that of the present, making the reasonable estimate that every ton of steam is equal to five of sail, it will be seen that our flag floats over nearly as much foreign commerce as in 1856. The decrease of percentage carried has resulted principally—mark this—from the increase of American commerce, while American ships have not increased in proportion.

In the main our legislation up to the year 1849 was wise, and our interests were promoted thereby until a change of situation demanded new measures, not yet afforded; but unwise legislation and diplomacy have, however, occurred, to the damage and destruction of American interests. It is computed that if our vessels to-day carried the same percentage of the foreign trade as in 1856 our citizens would now be earning $118,000,000 more of money annually.

Now, what have been the causes, and what is the remedy?

That we may fully understand the question, let us consider side by side the history of English and American shipping. There have been two competitors for the carrying trade of the high seas—two great leviathans, as it were, struggling for the mastery of the deep—England and America; and by presenting their policies, practices, and progress since they became competitors, the cause of our shipping decay and the remedies will become as apparent as the noonday sun.

These two powers have been making most remarkable history during the last century. Previous to 1855 our tonnage exceeded that of any nation excepting England. Our shipping interests were composed of two great branches—ship-building and ship-owning—mutually dependent on each other. Although labor in the United States was much dearer than the pauper labor of Europe, yet as ships were built principally of wood—this material being much cheaper in the United States than in England—it counterbalanced the cheaper labor of that nation and enabled the American ship-builder to compete successfully with the ship-builder of England. The American ship-owner, with dearer capital and employing dearer labor, found himself when afloat upon the high seas in open competition with the cheaper labor and capital of England; but the laws, however, of the United States shielded him with a protective clause, and provided a 10 per cent. discriminating duty against all imports into American ports in foreign bottoms.

The act of June 7, 1794, laying "duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States," contained this clause:

> That an addition of 10 per cent. shall be made to the several rates of duties above specified and imposed in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise which after the said last day of June instant shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States.

These facts, together with our superior activity, our inventive genius, unbounded energy—the skill of the new blood of this country—resulted in faster ships, manned by fewer men, and in cheaper transport, and enabled the American flag to float on every sea in competition with any foreign land. We not only carried 75 per cent. of our own commerce, but much of that of other nations.

During the administration of President Polk, however, some very interesting and important events occurred. England had been watching our success with a covetous eye; she well knew that she could not lead us so long as wood constituted the principal material for ships. England bought some wooden vessels of us about this time, well knowing that she lacked the timber and that no legislation could enable her to produce it. She knew that she could not compete with us when she had to import three cargoes of timber from the United States for every ship she built in competition with us. But, mark it, she never bought from us a single iron ship. For a number of years England had been casting about for something to take the place of wood. Commerce she knew was demanding more rapid transportation, vessels of greater strength and speed—smaller consumers of coal with larger capacity for carrying. Iron solved the problem, and England, wide awake and vigilant, did everything in her power to promote and develop the wonderful revolution which occurred about this time from wood to iron and from sail to steam. This turned the tide against the American ship-builder, for the cost of an iron ship is made up principally of the labor from the ore in the mine until it is finished and ready to float; and as labor was cheaper in England than in the United States, the power of the American ship-builder was gone never to return so long as he was compelled without protection or more favorable conditions to compete with the cheaper labor of England.

About this time also protection was withdrawn from the American ship-owner, and foreign vessels were admitted into American ports on terms of perfect freedom. For in 1847 Mr. Bancroft, acting under instructions, had proposed to England, as the President at that time had authority to do, that the two nations should mutually open their ports to the ships of the other. In 1849 England accepted the tender. This had the effect to repeal the law of 1794 and to give the English iron ships, then coming into use, the freedom of our ports. It accorded them free trade, and has proven a mistaken policy.

The law which authorized this abrogation was passed in 1815, over thirty years before, when the situation was entirely different. Then we were supreme with our wooden vessels; but our successes abroad were impeded by the restrictive policy of England preventing our vessels trading with her and her colonies. But England would never exchange favors until she found it would pay her and not us to do so. Therefore, thirty years after, when through the supplanting of wood by iron hulls and paddle-wheels by iron screws it seemed likely that England would soon lead America because of her cheaper labor, then England was ready; and then we should have declined. During all the time that American vessels could have enjoyed such a mutuality England would not permit it. Just as the change enabled the English vessels to enjoy the benefit, we allowed it on all foreign ships and opened our ports to absolute free trade in shipping; but fortunately Mr. Buchanan, as Secretary of State, reserved our coastwise trade. The only wonder now is that we did not open up that also to English vessels, for we have generally done about whatever England desired.

Thus was the American foreign shipping interest exposed to the free trade of the world, and of course in competition with the cheaper capital and pauper labor of England it was impossible for us to succeed, and the wonder is that our foreign shipping has survived as long as it has. The British lion it seems never gets ready to lie down with the American lamb until there is a fair prospect of the lamb being inside. All agree now that the revolution from wood to iron was the occasion for the decline. But why? Simply because it took away the advantage we had hitherto possessed of cheaper material which had balanced England's cheaper labor; and with free trade upon the high seas, through the repeal of the 10 per cent. differential duty, the result was inevitable. When American manufacturers on land could not successfully compete even for home markets against the manufacturers of England on a free-trade basis, much less could we have expected American ships without discriminating protective duties to have successfully competed on the ocean with English ships for the carrying trade of our country. The free trade accorded foreign ships has run off our American ships. This is now so apparent that "he who runs may read."

Instead of our legislation having then protected our shipping interests until they are "protected to death," as some glibly assert, the truth is that it has been exposed to free trade and has been compelled to suffer the legitimate consequence. Free trade on the high seas killed America's foreign shipping interests. Since 1849 every American-built vessel or every American-owned vessel floating on the ocean, and competing for the carrying trade of this and other countries, instead of being protected to any extent, even the slightest, has on the contrary been exposed to the fullest and freest operation of free-trade competition with the pauper labor and cheap capital of foreign countries. No other result than such as witnessed could have been anticipated.

Luckily, however, we did not expose our coastwise commerce to free-trade competition; we protected it by prohibiting any foreign vessel from participating in it; and to-day, as I will show further on, it is the most prosperous of all the carrying trades, is safer, more profitable, and cheaper than any existing elsewhere.

ENGLAND PROVIDES FOR HER OWN SHIPPING.

During all this time England was resorting to every other method possible to benefit her shipping interests. She appointed commissions to investigate the whole matter. In 1821 she first employed her steamers in the postal service, but the receipts were less than the outlay and a large annual loss to the government occurred; yet public opinion determined that a system which promoted public prosperity and national defense was not because of cost to be abandoned, for, as the English treasury committee said in 1853, the object which led to the formation of these mail contracts was to afford a rapid, frequent, and effectual communication to distant ports and to their foreign possessions, to foster maritime intercourse, and to encourage the production of a superior class of vessels which would promote the commerce and wealth of the country in time of peace and assist in defending its shores against hostile aggression.

These expectations were realized, and the commerce and the general welfare of England wonderfully enhanced. It was not merely to enable her ship-owners to establish themselves in the carrying trade and earning of profits that England appropriated of her funds so liberally. She fully realized the bearing of increased postal communication on the wealth and progress of the nation at large. England was the great manufacturing country of the world, and she wanted all nations to buy her goods, and that her productions might be successfully introduced throughout the world she gave her steamship lines the most radical and effectual protection. She thus not only secured commercial conquests in peace, but insured a merchant marine easily available for war. Evidently England did not think, as some of our theorists do to-day, that it made no difference who carried her mails so they were carried the cheapest.

Between 1840 and 1860 England paid out under her board of admiralty $120,000,000 to steamships. The amount annually paid was equal to 30 per cent. on the capital invested. The citizen of no other nation could afford to meet the ship-owner of Great Britain in open competition; for it was not only a competition with the English citizen, but also with the treasury of Great Britain. Call it what you may, bounty, subsidy, or liberal mail-pay, England since 1848, when America changed her policy, has paid over $165,000,000 to English shipping interests; while America has only paid about $25,000,000 to American vessels, and out of its abundant generosity to citizens of other countries has given $7,000,000 to English vessels to carry American mails.

Strange as it may seem, America has been subsidizing English mail steamship lines, thus needlessly nursing a foreign commercial viper that it might strike back at our commerce and our national life.

AMERICA BECOMING PASSIVE.

While England was thus liberally subsidizing her own mails, assisted by us, what were we doing? Nothing. Simply sleeping while our commercial enemy was sowing tares.

For a few years previous to 1847 we seemed to realize the desperate efforts of our English commercial rival to supplant us upon the high seas, and our policy was liberal toward American vessels carrying American mails. Congress entered into fair contracts for mail-pay to several lines, and had vested the authority in the Department to extend liberal contracts to any American foreign line. President Polk's enlightened policy in this respect, however mistaken it was in the other, I mention is worthy of all commendation. Substantial aid was rendered the Collins, Bremen, Havre, Aspinwall, Pacific, Havana, and other lines. But the policy prevailed only a few years. British influence and other causes soon led to its abandonment. No more contracts were made, and those already in existence were to cease at the expiration of their periods. Thus were American ships exposed to all the competition of free trade, to the cheap capital, cheap ships, and cheap labor of England, without any protection; in other words, scuttled and deserted upon the high seas.

Men like Webster, Bayard, Clayton, and McLane protested, but to no avail. By that act America gave up the high seas to England, and in a few years, as these contracts expired, the competition under free-trade principles witnessed the turning point—1855, when our carrying trade commenced to decline. England thereafter took the lead rapidly, and America has since been continually dropping behind. The policy of England since that time has been to remove all burdens upon English shipping and to afford all necessary protection, while the policy of the American Government has been to deny any protection and to retain upon our statutes all the burdensome restrictions which should have been removed. Up to about 1846 England was aggressive and America was retaliatory. England has since increased her aggressiveness, while America has passively allowed her to grasp our carrying trade. At that time our laws and the laws of England relating to merchant marine were substantially the same. In 1852-'53-'54 the Parliament of England began a revision and removed every burden from her vessels engaged in her foreign trade, while we simply looked on and did nothing.

BUREAU OF COMMERCE.

England created a board of trade, whose watchful supervision has greatly aided the English merchant marine and commerce. Nothing of the kind has ever existed in the United States.

TAXATION.

England removed her tax on the valuation of the ship as personal property and taxed only the income. America taxed the ship as personal property in the several States from 2 to 3 per cent. upon its valuation. In England, if the line earned nothing there was no tax; in America, even if running at a loss, or rotting at a dock alongside an English vessel busily loading under the operation of free trade, it was taxed from 2 to 3 per cent. per year on its value. Two per cent. in capital is a terrible handicap to bear. What man could succeed in competition with another if compelled to pay 2 per cent. more for his capital invested?

Some of our States have changed their system, but others retain it; and possibly only the power of the United States Government in the exercise of its right under the Constitution to regulate commerce can inhibit this unjust discrimination through prevention of municipal taxation of instruments of commerce engaged in trade with foreign nations, either directly or by changing the situs of the property through registration in the District of Columbia.

During the war, in addition to other burdens, income taxes were imposed on what little our ships made, on their gross receipts, and on every passenger ticket sold. How was it in regard to

OUR CONSULAR SYSTEM?

England appropriates money for hers; we tax American shipping to support ours; in fact, we even collect a surplus revenue. Last year the consular system of the United States took from the Treasury $750,000 for its support, and turned into the Treasury from taxes on shipping $830,000—$80,000 more than was necessary to support the whole consular system. England, on the contrary, remodeled her law so that during the last year she only taxed English ships about $200,000 for this purpose, and appropriated from her public treasury for the support of her foreign consular service the sum of $1,300,000. The English consuls not being dependent upon fees collected off ships for their support have no inducement to become "robbers on a four-years' raid." The United States, on the contrary, as has been forcibly said, compels her consuls to scrape their fees from American ships.

HOSPITAL SERVICE.

England established an excellent hospital system for seamen and sustained it, not by taxing her shipping but by appropriations and private contributions. The United States established an excellent system also; but, unlike any other nation, in order that the system might be self-sustaining, it taxes the ships 40 cents per month on each seaman.

ADVANCE WAGES.

England's remodeled law requires no advance wages. America forces its ships to pay before the cruise three months' advance wages, which requirement experience has demonstrated is a benefit principally to sailor boarding-house landlords, and has given rise to notorious "blood-money" systems.

EXTRA WAGES.

England in 1854 repealed her law requiring the payment to every seaman discharged in a foreign port three months' extra wages; but America retains this burden, although the reason for it has long since ceased to exist.

LIMITED LIABILITY.

England provided that the responsibility of a part owner should be only the extent of the interest in the vessel. Under our law a serious question arises, causing hesitancy in the minds of many capitalists through the uncertainty of the law, whether a part owner will be held individually liable for all the debts and charges upon the vessel.

TRANSPORTATION OF SEAMEN.

On American vessels are imposed the burdens of transporting seamen destitute or disabled at rates wholly inadequate, allowing only $10 for any voyage; a burden not imposed by any other nation.

TONNAGE DUES.

England levies none, but America imposes a tax of 30 cents a ton per annum. However, as this is borne largely by English vessels, the discriminating effect is not so bad. Yet, under the law as it has stood for years, there is an unjust discrimination against American sailing vessels that were compelled to pay as much for one or two trips per year as an English steamship did for a dozen trips. It also discriminated locally against our Pacific coast grain fleets to Europe, which make but one trip in a year as against the ten or twelve trips of the grain steamships of the East. These discriminations are partly removed by the proposition to change it to a tax upon each entry of 6 cents per ton. Under our free-trade treaties we are prohibited from taking it off American vessels without also taking it off from foreign ones.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN MEASUREMENT.

According to our measurement laws we include the officers' quarters, engine and boiler space, and coal-bunkers, while all other nations measure only the net carrying capacity of the ship. This has a burdensome effect on American ships, not only in the payment of tonnage dues at home, but wherever charges are based on tonnage capacity it makes it cost our vessels about 33 per cent. more for wharfage, for repairs on dry-docks, for dockage, for passing through the Suez Canal, and other charges of like character.

THE BRITISH LLOYDS.

There are other discriminations to which I must allude and from which American vessels suffer. My attention has been called to it by merchants engaged in wheat shipments from the Pacific coast to England; but the evil is general. It is the growth of years of accumulating power, not on the part of a British Parliament but by the Society of the British Lloyds. This powerful institution of British merchants and underwriters in the interest of British shipping has fixed unjust and unwarranted distinctions in favor of English iron vessels in marine inspection, classification, and registration, and in premium rates for insurance and charter rates for freight.

LIBERAL MAIL PAY.

Since 1830 England has paid more than $250,000,000 for mail service. Even since 1855, the commencement of the decline of American shipping interests, from the reports of the British postmaster-general we find that England has paid in subsidies or liberal mail pay to English ships for carrying her mails over $106,000,000.

Let me give a single instance: Great Britain contracted for a line of steamships between an English port and Brazil for the carrying of the mails and the opening of a new line of trade, giving them an absolute subsidy of $2,500,000 and guaranteeing 6 per cent. dividend, with a provision that if the dividend should exceed 8 per cent. the British Government should get a share of it; thus making England practically copartner in the enterprise. In fact, England has invariably pursued this policy when it became necessary either to establish a new important line or to run off a foreign competitor, and has only dispensed with a subsidy when it was no longer necessary. On the contrary, how has America treated her ships? They are required to carry the foreign mails for compensation which is practically nothing.

Our law compels American vessels to dance attendance on the pleasure of the postmasters of the port before a clearance can be had. They can not leave without the mail. In many instances they are compelled to carry it at a loss. As for instance, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company paid out in San Francisco for land carriage for the Australia mails from the post-office to the docks more money than it received for carrying the mails to Australia. From the official report of the Postmaster-General it will be seen that the Department receives from postage collected on matter sent to foreign countries the sum of $2,100,230.46, and that the entire amount paid out for transporting the mails to foreign countries was $402,112.33, leaving a profit to the United States, at the expense of our ships, of $1,697,818.13.

To show how unjust the present law is, I will state that we allow for carrying our domestic mails 57½ cents per mile on an average, while our foreign mails are allowed from three-fourths of 1 cent to 2½ cents per mile. While our law thus restricts the compensation we allow to American vessels, it permits us to contract to any extent with English or other foreign vessels for the carrying of the United States mails.

The bill now before Congress on the House Calendar proposes to remedy this evil by allowing the Postmaster-General to enter into contracts with the lowest responsible bidder for the carrying of the mails upon the sea as upon the land.

Now a word as to the general policy. It is a question of prosperity in peace and safety in war. Ours is a great country, with varied resources and of wonderful capacity for development. Our people are wide-awake, inventive, energetic, progressive, and prosperous. Our growth has been rapid and unprecedented, and the surplus productions, both raw and manufactured, of this great nation will be seeking every mart of the world. Like England in the past, we will profit by the many new avenues opened for trade and commerce. As the mail facilities followed the pioneer of the West and did its effective work in the development of our country, as the mail service of England opened the way for the establishment of new marts of commerce to England, so will the extension of a like policy by America redound to her welfare and prosperity.

Many striking instances can be given where exports have wonderfully increased as ocean mail facilities had been extended; in fact, the experience of the world has undoubtedly demonstrated that steam mail lines are the keys which open foreign ports to maritime commerce. Take an instance from the Pacific coast: before the postal contract was made in 1875 with the colonial government of Australia, whereby the Pacific Mail Steamship Company was paid a subsidy or mail pay of $400,000 per annum to enable it to open a line between San Francisco and Australia and New Zealand, our exports amounted almost to nothing, carried as they were by a few sailing vessels running at rare intervals. What now is the result? A rapid growth of commerce, increasing yearly until our exports have reached over 93,510 tons of our manufactures and merchandise. The policy of England in this and other respects since the time when our shipping interests were at their height has resulted in an increase of the steam fleet of England from 304,550 tons in 1854 to 5,120,000 in 1883, or more than the ocean steam tonnage of all the rest of the world. Under her policy of encouragement to steam and iron vessels that interest has increased in the last twenty-nine years 1700 per cent. Her earnings have increased from $120,000,000 in 1854 to $380,000,000 in 1883. England knew that it was to her interest to monopolize our carrying trade; she knew that her flag carried influence; that it carried with it respect from all the nations of the earth, as they became familiar with it as the trade of its nation expanded.

ENGLAND'S ACTION DURING THE WAR.

It is a most significant fact that immediately on the commencement of our late war England began the construction of fifteen ironclads. Since 1863 England expended upon her navy $156,000.000. And right here let me call attention to a fact worthy of special consideration, that of all the engines in the model and unequaled navy of England not one was built in a government navy-yard, but all were given to private builders. More than 80 per cent. of her naval marine was built in private ship yards, this being England's way of encouraging her ship and engine builders. This policy of encouraging private shipbuilders and home industries has been one of the potent causes of the wonderful growth and development of that industry in England. Now more than half the navies of the world are built in English ship yards, and nearly all governments are dependent upon her for their naval ships.

It was England's grand commercial scheme to make the South an immense cotton and corn plantation from which she could procure these products and in return could sell her manufactures. When the war commenced, born of the results of this free-trade idea and of slavery, notwithstanding England had taunted us for years on account of our national crime, she suddenly saw her chance and exerted every nerve to profit from the result. England wanted our carrying trade, and that she might keep alive the internal dissensions between two great sections of this country she bought the cotton of the South and sold her the means to fight the North. She connived at confederate cruisers preying without mercy upon the commerce of the United States. She allowed her merchants to fit out iron vessels of light draught and great speed as blockade-runners, seven hundred and thirty-three of which were captured by the United States while loaded with munitions of war from the mother country and with cargoes valued on appraisal at more than $26,000,000.

During the war, through capture by anglo-confederate cruisers or sales to avoid capture, we lost one-third of our foreign-going shipping. Whenever we withdrew a ship England put one on; and when she saw that she had control of the carrying trade, finding the power of the United States aroused, she turne dher back upon the South. Great Britain's success at home, through these and other causes, has enabled her to put over $680,000,000 into ships. She owns more than half of the ocean steam tonnage of the world, and over one-half of the steamships of France and Germany are built in England. More than one-half of the world's foreign trade is to-day carried in English ships. Between the commencement of the war, in 1860, and 1870 England's shipping increased 400 per cent.; and when the war was over she was in almost full possession of our carrying trade. Of course during this terrible conflict of arms the energies and the capital of our country were engrossed for four long years. Instead of building our shipping up, we were tearing it down with powder and shot and shell.

England all this time was intrenching herself in the position we had occupied, building up her great iron-ship yards and securing advantages which only time could overcome. When our war was over speculation raged; interest, which had been high on account of the money demands of the Government, increased as the soldiers returned to their homes, becoming borrowers of capital with which to invest again in business, and the undeveloped West was affording large returns for the use of money, and, as said by the late Commodore Vanderbilt, 7 per cent. could never drive 5 per cent. off the sea. Our country was absorbed in the questions of reconstruction, of the payment of the public debt, of resumption of specie payments, and of other like important subjects. Our Navy was composed of old line-of-battle ships of no practical use in modern warfare; inventions in the art of naval warfare required new and better vessels. Since the war we have appropriated for the construction of new modern ships only $3,200,000—a sum less than that expended by the smallest nation in the world. Three millions for this great nation with its extensive coast and foreign interests, as against $4,000,000 by the Argentine Republic, $7,000,000 by Chili, $18,000,000 by Holland, $90,000,000 by France, and $160,000,000 by England.

While English workshops under the operation of her beneficent policy have prospered, while the Clyde has become the great manufacturing center for the world, it might be interesting to know what has become of the new workshops stimulated into existence during the civil conflict. I quote from a statement made by Mr. John Roach:

The Allaire Works, in which was built the first steam-engine that ever carried a ship across the Atlantic, has been turned into a "tomb-stone" factory. The Novelty Works have become a gas-house; the Continental Works, owned by Mr. Roland, who built in one hundred days the little monitor which saved the nation's capital and probably the nation's life, have been given over to other business. The Fulton Works became an oil factory; the Neptune Works, a saw-mill. Webb's famous yard, in which were built part of the navies of Russia and Italy, became a lumber-yard; the great Franklin Forge, a brewery; and Steers's and Westervelt's and the other ship-yards of New York have all disappeared. Merrick & Sons, of Philadelphia, and the great Marine Engine Shops of Boston are closed; the tools and machinery which it had taken years to accumulate were sold at auction, having no more value than old iron, or if the plants had been in the heart of Africa instead of in the ports of a great nation needing more ships to carry its products than any other in the world.

One of the practical questions of the day is:

SHALL WE HAVE A NAVY?

Some say we do not need one because no foreign nation will declare war with us; that we are able to defend ourselves; that by the aid of a few torpedoes sunk in our harbors we could destroy any vessel of war attacking our coast. It is not well to feel too sanguine. War we know is the heritage of men, and we should not content ourselves with the idle hope of perpetual peace. The plowshares are liable at any day to be beaten into swords and the pruning-hooks into spears, and when war does come it is swift and terrible. Exposed and unprepared, the damage inflicted upon us would be beyond calculation. Even granting a certain degree of immunity from wars directed against us by other powers, yet occasions may arise when through wrongs done our American interests abroad we may desire to go to war—a condition of affairs liable to exist any time when the rights of our people, the just claims of our commerce, or the foreign policy of our nation are infringed.

Foreign nations, however, know that to-day we are unable to cope with them on their own domains or upon the high seas. Our remonstrances against infringement on our rights abroad would receive a more respectful consideration did foreign nations but know that behind our protest stood a potent power; that we possessed at least a sufficient navy to strike the point, for the time being, with effective blows or terror, even to a nation having a thousand million dollars' worth of merchant marine floating upon the high seas. If we differ as to the extent of carrying the principle that in time of peace we should prepare for war, we should at least pursue such a course as will the better enable us to make ready in haste when an emergency arises. While we may not need a very great navy, we should, however, be ready to build one promptly. By fostering ship-industry and ship-yards at home we take one of the most effective steps toward securing that desirable end.

DOES IT PAY TO BUY AND RUN SHIPS?

This is a practical business question, and it must be solved by ascertaining the real impediments in the way of success and how to remove them. The life of an iron vessel is about thirty years. The cost of running for the first two or three years equals the original cost of the ship. Therefore the building cost is to the running cost about as 1 is to 15. Thus it will be seen that the principal question is the cost of running. But first as to the cost of building. This is entirely a labor question, and in building iron vessels for the foreign trade our ship-builders are now and have been since the revolution from wood to iron subjected to the full competitive effect of the cheaper labor of England. We can yet build wooden vessels, quality for quality, as cheaply as they can be built anywhere, even after paying American wages to our workmen. But as to iron or steel ships the situation is different. Much of the labor which an American ship-builder has to employ costs him over 60 per cent. more than on the Clyde. We have directly protected every kind of labor in the United States other than the ship-building of foreign trading vessels. We have protected the factory man for the land, but our ship-factories for the sea, exposed to the cheapest labor of all nations, receives no immediate protection at our hands. Is that right; and could we have expected a different result? To suppose that we hitherto could have competed with England on the high seas on the basis of free trade is absurd.

Now, as to the cost of running. After the vessel is set afloat at an enhanced price, in order to run under the American flag the burdens from competition and bad laws must be removed.

The labor expense of running is against American vessels, and although many of our sailors are foreigners, quite a number of Americans are employed, and the comparison of the labor expense of operating American and English steamships of the same class, engaged in the same trade, during the same time, shows that for every dollar expended on the English ship for labor, the American ship paid one and a half dollars. There are now engaged in the foreign trade under the American flag thirty-four steamers, with a capital of $15,000,000 in ships and appliances. The greater part of this property has not paid a dollar dividend for many years, and the remainder has not paid 2 per cent. This is the statement of one of the largest owners, who is authorized to represent seven-eighths of the capital invested in these ships. I presume it is true that they are now kept afloat principally because of other American interests connected therewith, some of them, for instance, being but water extensions of American railway systems

Even a vessel costing nothing, engaged in the foreign trade in competition with an English ship, would find the difference on the single item of taxation and wages so great in favor of the foreign ship that running would be unprofitable, and much more so when the original cost—whether built in England or America—and interest thereon is taken into consideration. What practical remedy, then, would it be to enable us to go to England to buy ships and try to run them under American registers with the situation as it is? And what practical remedy would it have been to have had during all these years a "free registry" law? Some contend that the absence of such a law is the cause of the trouble, but it is evident that the same causes which would have sent us to England to buy ships would have sent us there to run them. During all that time England not only could build ships cheaper, but she could run them cheaper.

To show the practical bearing of cost of running, I call your attention to one significant fact, that notwithstanding the revolution from wood to iron much of the carrying trade of the world is still done in wooden vessels. The cost of construction of these vessels is less in the United States now than in 1856, and the same relative situation exists to-day, so far as other nations are concerned, as then; yet, notwithstanding, we have surrendered to England the carrying trade in wooden vessels also. Why? Because wooden-ship building and wooden-ship owning interests are mutually dependent; our ship-building depending upon remunerative employment of our ships, and our wooden-ship owners have found to their sorrow, since the repeal of all differential duties by treaties, that other nations are able to manage and run their vessels cheaper than we can.

No one can otherwise account for the fact. Neither tariff laws nor free-ship restriction can be summoned into service to explain the decline in wooden ships. It is a plain, startling, and convincing illustration of the effect of free trade on a single industry—wooden-ship building and ship-owning for foreign trade. And here it is pertinent to inquire why any free-trader, whose sole purpose is to get what he wants to-day the cheapest, ought to have any concern about the revival of American shipping? Why should he seek to change the situation? Why should he not let well-enough alone? Because, from his standpoint, as England is doing our work cheaper than we can do it ourselves, all therefore is well.

EFFECT OF AMERICA'S HOME PROTECTION POLICY.

Able gentlemen upon this floor have hitherto sought to make us believe that the protective policy is responsible for the decline in America's foreign shipping. They argue that protectionists have tried to put a wall about this country to destroy the usefulness of ships by destroying the foreign commerce. It is true our nation has sought to become independent of other countries, to decrease useless transportation of our raw material to foreign manufacturers and the manufactured articles back, besides securing many incidental benefits such as enhanced home markets, increased pay to our laborers, the keeping of our money at home, &c.; and instead of this policy, as claimed, building a wall around our country and destroying our commerce, it has on the contrary wonderfully enhanced it, and instead of shipping in we ship out. As we have grown in diversified industries and wealth we have become producers of much we could not formerly produce, and as a result our commerce has grown rapidly.

During the time of the maintenance of the American policy of protection the foreign commerce of this country, which some gentlemen would have us believe is rapidly being obliterated, has on the contrary been making most wonderful advancement. It indeed has assumed grand proportions. It has grown from a half billion dollars at the close of the war to over a billion and a half in 1883. According to David A. Wells, the total wealth of the United States increased from $16,150,000,000 in 1860 to $64,636,000,000 in 1880. At no period in the history of this country has our foreign commerce increased more rapidly than during this era of protection. The value of our imports and exports is to-day over three times as much as in 1855, when our foreign shipping began to decline. In 1856 the value of our exports and imports was $642,000,000; and 75 per cent. was carried in American vessels. In 1881 but 16 per cent. was thus carried, although the American commerce had increased to $1,675,000,000. In 1860, when our shipping was almost at its highest point, our exports of agricultural products was about $3.60 each for 30,000,000 people. In 1882 our exports of the same products had reached the sum of $12.40 for each of 50,000,000 of our population. Even during the last year, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, our foreign commerce has increased over $40,000,000.

This is indeed a wonderful picture of prosperity under the American protective policy. Instead of our foreign commerce declining, it has grown with almost unmeasured pace. The commerce upon the high seas of the United States alone, to say nothing of the increased commerce of the world in which American ship-building and ship-owning might engage, was never so great, so valuable, or so profitable as now. Mr. Wells says that the increase of the international commerce of the globe between 1850 and 1880 was estimated as high as 240 per cent. Under the policy of protection to American industries we had been able to make more money in producing than in carrying our products. Hitherto we have found it more profitable building iron locomotives to haul by land than in building iron ships to haul by water.

America has not been idle. The trouble is not now, and never has been, for want of commerce to carry, and no one can so claim; and no public man should so insinuate unless imbued with an idea of deceiving. With rapidly increasing American commerce, the trouble is American ships have given place to English ships through free-trade competition upon the high seas for our carrying trade. Great as this commerce is, the internal commerce of this country far exceeds it in magnitude. I will not attempt to state its wonderful and rapid growth since 1860, for every one knows that our progress has been almost beyond belief. Our manufactures in this young nation in 1880 had reached the enormous sum of $8,000,000,000. Yet since the close of the war we have paid off in indebtedness over $3,500,000,000, to say nothing of State, county, and municipal debts.

During this era of protection it is seen that commerce, both internally and externally, in its wonderful growth and development has absorbed the energy, skill, and capital of the nation; and instead of doing our own carrying, we have simply been hiring others to do it for us. We have paid them with our surplus wheat and cotton. But times are now changing; more diversity of industry is necessary; and we should extend, if possible, the benefits of our protective system upon the high seas. Let us build and own our own ships; let us carry our own products and compete for the carrying trade of the world. The avenues formerly open to capital are being occupied; the West is being settled; the iron bands are laid, and capital is now seeking fresh fields. The figures which I have cited show that on land where protection has had full operation our productions, our riches, our purchases of raw material, luxuries, &c., abroad have swollen our foreign commerce, while our shipping interest, unprotected and exposed to all the storms of competition from free trade, has declined. And yet men say we have been protecting American shipping interests until they are protected to death.

How, in the face of the facts, any man can assert that America has at any time since Polk's administration protected American shipping outside of our coasting trade, it is impossible for me to imagine.

PROTECTED COASTWISE TRADE.

Our coastwise trade has prospered. Mr. McLane, present governor of Maryland, stated upon this floor in the last Congress that "no shipping trade in the world is more prosperous." It shows a greater growth than that of the coastwise marine of any other nation, notwithstanding many railroads have been built to compete with it for the carrying trade, and to-day it is three times greater than that of Great Britain. The rates of transportation are kept low by domestic competition. American capital has constantly crowded into the construction and operation of coastwise vessels. Through the effects of coastwise protection this country is to-day the second iron-ship building nation in the world. Through its operations private ship-yards were developed at home which proved useful during our civil war, building over three hundred vessels for our Navy; and one American establishment has during the last ten years launched over $25,000,000 worth of iron vessels.

As the condition of our foreign shipping shows the blighting effect of free trade, so the wonderfully prosperous condition of our coastwise shipping shows the beneficent effect of protection.

CAN WE BUILD IRON SHIPS?

Of course we can. Our natural resources in coal, iron, and timber, the materials of which ships are built, are superior to those of any other country. This is the age of iron, the king of all metals, and the nation that can not produce it must forever be weak and without the means of self-defense. No nation can afford to be dependent upon another for iron. Were it not for the iron bands laid all over our immense territory the question of the maintenance of one central government would be a more serious one than at present. Our iron resources under the operation of protective legislation are developed far ahead of every other nation except England, and the practical result which we hope soon to reach is to be able to produce iron for ship-building in reasonable competition with that nation. This metal has been rapidly cheapening in this country during the last twenty years through the effects of our protective policy. From 1870 to 1880 our iron products increased 100 per cent. and the price was reduced 25 per cent.

Iron-ship building, although of but ten years' growth in the United States as against a growth of forty years in England, is making rapid progress. In ten years the difference between the cost of building an iron ship in America and on the Clyde has decreased over 50 per cent. The present difference in cost of iron vessels, both sail and steam, is probably an average of only 15 per cent. against America; but this is almost balanced by better material and finish, resulting in greater durability and strength, and by difficulties and delays occasioned by accident in being obliged to send to England, where the patterns are, in order to duplicate parts of machinery.

Fifty years ago we imported a locomotive from England as a sample. We now build millions upon millions of dollars' worth for home use and are able to compete with England in all parts of the world. Nearly all the locomotives used in the English colonies are built in the United States. We are able now, because of the great development of this industry, to build them better and cheaper than England; and we have been able to export since 1870 over twenty million dollars' worth of locomotives alone. If we can successfully build locomotives by protecting that industry and furnishing work for them to do, why can we not by a similar policy successfully build a ship of the same material? England has simply developed and used the iron ship, while America has developed and used the iron locomotive.

Iron in this country is regulated by the price in England, and follows it as closely as the mercury in a thermometer follows a change in the temperature. There are two great iron-producing and iron-competing countries, and in case America should stop producing a monopoly would be thrown into the hands of England which would be turned against us. Every motive, every interest, prompts us to maintain our protective policy toward our great iron industries. An eminent member of the last House said upon this floor that he had supposed that it was settled by the teaching of statesmen and the experience of nations that a country that was to be free, powerful, and progressive must contain and hold within itself the means of its own independence, the material of its own development, and the weapons of its own power; that we had a continent as an inheritance; that God had given this country great possibilities for ourselves, for the development of our principles, and for the extending of our influence all over the world; and that it was the duty of our National Legislature to provide all measures necessary to keep within our grasp, so far as might be, the dominion of the seas—that common arena, where progressive nations meet and measure their power in war and peace.

This doctrine has received the sanction of the great minds of this country from Washington down. The Father of his Country thought it a strange thing for a navigating people who could build to purchase their marine. All history proves that no commercial state ever maintained its supremacy upon the ocean unless it built its own vessels as well as sailed them. Interwoven in interest with nearly every industrial pursuit of our country are the twenty-five different classes of labor which are employed from the forest and the mine to the completed vessel. While the American mechanic and manufacturer and merchant sailor ask no protection for brains or energy or ingenuity, yet they do ask and they have a right to ask an equal chance in competition with the people of other countries. They ask for something which will bridge the chasm between the cost of labor in England and the cost of labor in America. I believe an American-built, an American-owned, and an American-manned merchant marine is a vital necessity in peace and essential as a naval reserve in war. When we buy our ships abroad we develop foreign interests, we deprive ourselves of the benefits of home industry, and a war with the very nation upon which we are dependent for ships may overtake us any day. Our nation should be sufficient unto itself.

FREE MATERIALS.

But it is said that the tariff in its operation upon the costs of materials from abroad, as, for instance, iron, has been a great drawback, and to partly remedy the evil, as claimed to exist, that free materials should be admitted, so that vessels can be built cheaper. I believe I state their position fairly. If it meant to remove all duty on raw material which could not be produced at home but must be purchased abroad, and which could not by the encouragement afforded by the protective system be produced at home, I should be quite disposed to favor it if in the interests of encouragement to ship-building. But the free-material cry as raised means not free raw material, but free advanced manufactured material. For instance, take cordage; the bills introduced in Congress propose to admit it for this purpose free of duty—legislation which would strike a fatal blow at the cordage works of this country upon the coast, which find in the ship-builders the purchasers of the great portion of their manufactures.

The "free material" idea means that the American ship-builder must and will go 3,500 miles to the Clyde for his materials. The great outlay for transportation, freight, commission, and insurance would place the American builder at heavy disadvantage in competition with the builder upon the Clyde. Even the short distance from the Clyde to the Thames was such a disadvantage that it broke up the ship-yards when the Clyde was improved, and the Thames builders were compelled to move to the Clyde—the location of the iron, coal, lime, and other materials. We can no more succeed in ship-building by purchasing our materials in England for iron ships than England succeeded in building wooden vessels with wood from Maine. No practical American ship-builder has any faith in such a scheme, and not one is asking for it.

Mr. Cramp stated some time since that he had in his own yards five first-class iron steamships in process of construction, requiring 16,000,000 pounds of iron, costing on completion $2,500,000; and that the repeal of all the dues would not benefit him $10,000, and while it would possibly afford him that much temporary gain it would, on the contrary, inflict upon him a permanent loss by probably closing the furnaces and mills to which he looked for supplies. The American ship-builders do not even use the legislation in that line already upon the statute-books. Sections 2513 and 2514 of the Revised Statutes allow the use of lumber, timber, hemp, manila, iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, and bolts, copper, and composition metal necessary for the construction of vessels for the foreign trade, and all articles of foreign production needed in the repair of vessels in the foreign trade free of all duty, and yet Mr. Roach, the leading American ship-builder, says that since that law went into operation he has built ten million dollars' worth of vessels for the foreign trade, and has never once made use of it. If taking the duty off imported material will cheapen ships, if this is the object sought, why not cut directly across and admit the foreign ship-duty free and be done with it?

FREE SHIPS.

The law which restricts the right of American registry to vessels built in this country has come down to us from the time of Washington with the indorsement of such men as Jefferson, Adams, Madison, and Monroe. For nearly a hundred years, both in prosperity and adversity, no English ship has been allowed the benefit of an American registry, and the "free ship" advocates propose the repeal of the law as the great remedy for evils that have arisen since 1849.

While we are seeking to remove some of the burdens resting upon American shipping, a proposition to take a burden from foreign ships is proposed as a remedy.

Mr. Chairman, if the American merchant marine is reinstated it will be by fostering it and not its rivals; and no policy looking to England for the supply of our vessels can be safe or wise. The proposition misnamed "free ships" is an admission founded solely on the effects of past operation under free-trade competition that it is perfectly useless for Americans to attempt to build or run American ships in competition with English ships, or even to attempt any policy of building up ship-yards at home which can compete with the Scotchman upon the Clyde; and that hereafter we should patronize English ship-yards for ships and register and run them as American vessels. "Free ships" means to buy of England. No other nation will have them for sale.

Consider for a moment the "free ships" proposition. While all our American ship-building industries are taxed for the support of this country, it is proposed to let the ship-builder of England, who has paid nothing toward its support, sell his products in our market without duty. Should they not at least pay a sum equal to the raw material, machinery, and outfit of the ship before they are thus admitted along with the product of our country to the privilege of American registry? This cry for "free ships," as it is called, arose through agitation in England's interest when a war-cloud had appeared in Europe; when England had six hundred millions of capital invested in her merchant marine, endangered by the possible warlike complications; when she desired, through this change in our navigation law, through fictitious titles and mortgages, possibly to transfer her shipping to American registry for protection until the war-clouds had blown over, then to be retransferred to England, that it could be more cheaply operated. At this time there were one hundred millions of capital invested in foreign ships coming into the port of New York alone.

The cry was raised all over this country and in the halls of legislation, and it has been kept alive by the press of our great commercial city, whose large influential importing houses are but the agents of English manufacturing interests, and by England, who wants us to buy from her rather than to build, and in her hope that eventually this will be an entering-wedge into our coastwise trade which she so greatly covets. If we admit English ships to American registry in foreign trade, why not admit them into the coastwise trade? Shall you say that a man may buy an English ship and yet not use it anywhere he pleases? England well knows there is no stopping place in principle until we have opened our whole coastwise trade to her vessels. In the face of the figures given it is evident that even were we to admit English ships to American registry under the operation of the present laws and situation, it would be impracticable to run them. If it be merely the privilege of buying and running an English ship for profit, any American can now much better enjoy that privilege under the English law.

England formerly had almost a monopoly of the manufacturing industries, producing in excess of her home consumption, and therefore she desired America and every other nation to allow her free trade. England now has a monopoly of ship-building and ship-owning, and wants America and all other nations to open their ports to her ship-builders and ship-owners.

The decadence of American foreign shipping interests is not caused by any law providing that American vessels only shall be admitted to American registry, and no mere repeal can afford any practical relief. France had a free-ship clause, and yet without avail. With her cheaper capital and labor she has been compelled to resort to subsidies, and to-day is paying both bounties and subsidies to her ship-builders and ship-owners. In 1870 her steam tonnage was, in round numbers, 150,000 tons; in 1880 it was 277,000 tons; in 1882 it had reached 364,000 tons; and in 1883, under the effects of the mileage compensation or subsidy to merchant ships, it rose to 667,000 tons. When this French bounty law was passed Bismarck said it would "create for France a powerful navy which might prove of effective service in time of war, and a merchant marine, the handmaid of all industries of agriculture and commerce."

WE NEED NOT DO WHAT ENGLAND DESIRES.

It is no argument, Mr. Chairman, that America should do a certain thing because her commercial rivals desire it. Look back over our shipping legislation and tell me of a single act that England did not want us to do that has not resulted in our benefit. Tell me of a single act that England desired us to do that has not resulted in our commercial injury. England wanted us to give her ships free trade, and we did it; she wanted us to take off our 10 per cent. protection to American bottoms, and we did it. She wants us to admit free material and to cut down our revenue and to repeal our tariff laws, and to buy our ships from her and admit them to American registry. She wants our coastwise trade. She wants us, if we will not go farther, to continue in the future as in the past; and I regret to say some of us seem to be willing, for every proposition coming before the American Congress for years looking to some substantial aid to our American shipping interests has been kicked about like a beggar's hat in the street.

Great Britain wants us to content ourselves with our present worthless Navy; to let her build our merchant ships, to do our carrying trade, to pay her for carrying our mails, and to let her continue without competition in her policy of building new markets all over the world for her surplus products. England does not want us to afford any protection to either ship-building or ship-owning in America, nor to pay any bounties or subsidies, or to award any mail contracts to American vessels. She does not want us to carry our own mails, either for liberal pay or otherwise, nor to take any steps looking to the protection of our American shipping interests, or the growth of our American trade abroad.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not charge that honorable gentlemen upon the floors of the American Congress are speaking intentionally in the interest of British shipping. I ascribe to them as patriotic motives as I claim for myself. But I do say that not a word has ever been stated upon the floor of the House in behalf of free ships or free materials or free trade that British manufacturers, British ship-yards, and British shipping interests do not applaud to the echo.

The last thirty years might well be termed the period of the commercial war of Great Britain upon our mercantile marine. That great "Sovereign of the Seas" has conquered every deep-water port in our country and secured perfect freedom to her ships and shipping, and now seeks to guide and direct our national policy in other respects, not with authority or violence, but by every device of policy, by her press and speakers, her merchants and underwriters, and by every form of influence that a great and powerful nation can exert. Will she further succeed? We shall see.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word in addition. This Government needs revenue. It will not adopt entire free trade, and thus be compelled to raise its needed funds by direct taxation. A tariff tax will be maintained and tariff dues will be laid hereafter as in the past, mainly upon articles imported and sold here from abroad in competition with the productions of our own people. It will be a tariff wisely adjusted so as not to foster monopolies, and will be limited to the necessities of good government and the public welfare.

Let these tariff dues hereafter be so adjusted as not only to afford incidental protection to our home productions but also to afford like aid to our merchant ships engaged in our foreign carrying trade, as it formerly did from 1794 to 1849. Let our wonderful development on land and our rapid increase of commerce abroad be supplemented by a growth and triumph of our shipping upon the high seas. Let the experience of the past give us wisdom in the future.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, how much of my time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. PRICE. I will reserve it, as I wish to yield it to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID], who is not now here.

Mr. MORRISON moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. ADAMS, of New York, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce duties on imports and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 10 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BEACH: Resolutions of Radcliff Post, No. 205, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New York, in regard to pension legislation—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLOUNT: Petition for the passage of Senate bill appropriating money for school purposes in the several States—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. W. R. COX: Petitions of George S. Baker, William H. Mitchell, and 279 others, citizens of Franklin County, North Carolina, requesting aid from the General Government for the cause of education—to the same committee.

By Mr. HANBACK: Resolutions of Logan Post, No. 177, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, relative to pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAYNES: Petition of members of George S. Cram Post, Grand Army of the Republic, and ex-soldiers of the late war, asking certain pension legislation—to the same committee.

By Mr. KING: Petition for the improvement of Bayou D'Arbonne, Louisiana—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. MORGAN: Resolutions of T. H. Richardson Post, No. 93, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Missouri, requesting Congressional action upon pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MORRILL: Petition of Seneca Light Artillery Regiment, of Kansas State Militia, in favor of H. R. 5980—to the Committee on the Militia.

Also, memorial of the National Association of ex-Union Prisoners of War, asking for the passage of H. R. 1189—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NUTTING: Resolutions of the General Assembly of New York, in regard to patents, &c.—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL: Protest against the increase of silver coinage from the Philadelphia Board of Trade—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, resolution of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, favoring the passage of the uniform bankrupt bill known as the Lowell bill—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. W. F. ROGERS: Memorial of the Merchants' Exchange of the city of Buffalo, for the speedy passage of the bankrupt act—to the same committee.

By Mr. ROSECRANS: Petition of 9 officers of the Fourteenth Infantry and 2 of the Fifth Artillery, in favor of the passage of H. R. 2613—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of 3 officers of the Eleventh Infantry, in favor of the passage of S. 1677—to the same committee.

By Mr. T. G. SKINNER: Petition of 375 citizens of Hertford County, North Carolina, and of Thomas Latham and others, of Plymouth, N. C., for educational aid—severally to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. SINGLETON: Papers relating to the claim of James R. Bowles—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. YAPLE: Resolution of the Michigan State board of health, relative to the prevention of the introduction of infectious diseases into the United States—to the Select Committee on the Public Health.

By Mr. YOUNG: Papers relating to the claim of John R. Jones—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 23, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State in response to a resolution of the Senate of February 29, 1884, requesting information concerning the respective average production, consumption, exportation, and importation of wheat, rye, corn, and cotton in foreign countries, together with statistics showing the production and surplus or deficiency in the crops of the past two years in each of such countries; an estimate of the probable requirements of such products from the United States to meet the wants of these countries before the crops of the coming crop-year are ready for market, and other available information concerning the questions to which the resolution refers.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 22, 1884.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 26th ultimo, a letter of the Light-House Board on the subject of the reduction and lowering of the light on Portland Head, in the State of Maine; which was read.

Mr. FRYE. Should not that letter go to the Committee on Commerce?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks so. The Chair was about to state that if there be no objection the letter, with the accompanying report, will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. There is something for consideration there. A week before that letter was written there was a vessel lost by reason of the change in that light, and for no other reason.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the letter, with the accompanying report, will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3056) to constitute a bureau of navigation in the Treasury Department was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 6535) to regulate the granting of pensions in certain cases was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 2728) detaching Grundy County, Tennessee, from the southern district of East Tennessee and attaching it to the middle district of said State, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 235) to print additional copies of certain publications was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of the German Society of Pennsylvania, praying that the plan proposed by Oliver Evans Wood, of Philadelphia, for effecting the better delivery of letters from European countries may receive the careful consideration of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CULLOM presented the memorial of Doying & Hindricksen, publishers of the Illinois Courier, Jacksonville, Ill.; the memorial of F. K. and A. W. Bastian, publishers of the Fulton Journal, Fulton, Ill.; the memorial of H. J. Dunlap, publisher of the Gazette, Champaign, Ill.; the memorial of the Southern Illinois Press Association; the memorial of Abraham E. Smith, publisher of the Gazette, at Rockford, Ill.; and the memorial of Pierce, Burton & Co., publishers of the Daily Express and the Weekly Herald, at Aurora, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the bill to copyright news; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I present a petition very numerously signed by business men of the city of Boston, praying for the continuance of the fast-mail service that was provided for in the law of last year. As the Post-Office appropriation bill embracing that matter has passed the Senate and will soon be before a committee of conference, I move that this petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented resolutions adopted by Burnham Post, No. 358, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, in favor of the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions and the equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of David H. Coyner, late private Company A, One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, which was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Assembly concurrent resolution No. 10, relative to the establishment of experimental stations in connection with agricultural colleges.

Whereas there is now pending before Congress a bill to establish national experimental stations in connection with the agricultural colleges of the various States: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their utmost endeavor to secure the passage of said bill.

Resolved, That the governor of the State of California be requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives.

H. M. LA RUE,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN DAGGETT,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

THOS. L. THOMPSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. DOLPH presented resolutions adopted by the J. B. Matthews Post, No. 6, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Oregon, praying for the passage of such legislation in regard to pensions as is recommended by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of Sedgwick Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, praying for certain legislation in regard to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a memorial of Holmes, Booth & Hayden, manufacturers, of Waterbury, Conn., and a memorial of the Illinois Watch Company, of Springfield, Ill., remonstrating against the repeal or hostile modification of the present patent laws; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of Alonzo A. Warner and 34 other members of Morton A. Taintor Post, No. 9, Grand Army of the Republic, of Colchester, Conn., praying for the extension of the arrears of pension act, increase of widows' pensions, and other pension legislation; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the New Haven (Conn.) Clock Company and other citizens of New Haven, Conn., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1924, reorganizing the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLATT. I present a petition of numerous manufacturers, engineers, inventors, and others, citizens of the United States, with reference to the proposed legislation on the subject of patents. It is a supplemental petition to the one introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] the other day when the bill was recommitted. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of Skelley Post, No. 9, Grand Army of the Republic, of Gettysburg, Pa.; a petition of John A. Croll Post, No. 156, Grand Army of the Republic, of Kittanning, Pa.; a petition of George P. Scudder Post, No. 340, Grand Army of the Republic, of Equinunk, Pa.; a petition of Billings Post, No. 392, Grand Army of the Republic, of Nicholson, Pa.; a petition of Sofield Post, No. 49, Grand Army of the Republic, of Osceola, Pa.; and a petition of McCullough Post, No. 367, Grand Army of the Republic, of Waynesburg, Pa., praying that Congress comply with the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions and the equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Association of the port of New York, praying for the passage of House bill 5892, known as the Dingley pilotage bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of H. M. Pollock and 80 other citizens of Indiana County, Pa., praying for the passage of the Robinson bill to pension ex-prisoners of war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present a memorial of the publishers of the Democrat and Journal, of Sidney, Ohio; a memorial of the publishers of the Torchlight, Xenia, Ohio; a memorial of the publishers of the Chronicle and Weekly Democrat, of Delaware, Ohio; and a memorial of the publishers of the Bulletin, of Miamisburg, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill commonly called the news-copyright bill. The bill has been reported adversely, and I move that the memorials lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present a petition of the National Association of ex-Union Prisoners of War, of Cleveland, Ohio; the petition of Burnham Post, No. 358, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio; the petition of Post No. 239 of the same association, Department of Ohio; and the petition of J. C. McCoy Post, No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, praying the attention of Congress to various pension bills that are pending before it. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I also present the petition of a great many citizens of Covington, Ohio, in relation to Senate bill No. 1223, now pending before the Senate, and I am requested to have the petition referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. It relates to a bill providing that there shall be no preference to one school of medicine or surgery over another in medical appointments of the Government service. I do not know how the bill came to be referred to that committee, but the request made to me is that the petition be so referred. If it be not properly referred, it can be reported back and the reference changed. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, calling the attention of the Senate to Senate bill No. 11 and House bill No. 1189, providing for pensioning the prisoners of war who were confined in the so-called confederate prisons during the late war. I presume the memorial has been heretofore presented by my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN], and I do not ask to have it read. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARLEY. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, relating to the establishment of experimental stations in connection with agricultural colleges, similar to the one presented this morning by my colleague [Mr. MILLER]. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

SAINT MARY'S FALLS CANAL, MICHIGAN.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1988) for the government and control of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal, Michigan, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). Is there unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read in full for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONGER. When the State of Michigan relinquished——

Mr. INGALLS. One moment. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I was about to say that the bill is too important and involves too many serious considerations to allow it to be passed without debate or consideration.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator hear an explanation of it?

Mr. INGALLS. I will object, withdrawing the objection sufficiently long to enable the Senator from Michigan to make his explanation.

Mr. CONGER. Thank you.

When the State of Michigan relinquished to the United States the Saint Mary's Falls Canal the Government accepted the canal and passed a law for its acceptance, but it passed no law giving any power to control the passage of boats and regulating and controlling the canal. The State of Michigan had a law on that subject, the effect of which was lost in the transfer. The Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, and General Poe, within whose department this is, have sent to the House of Representatives, which I have here, a report, with a bill, which is the bill that has been read. I introduced the bill, which was referred to the Secretary of War from these departments, and the Committee on Commerce have unanimously recommended the adoption of the bill. It is the same bill, with the same powers and the same control, varied to suit the necessities of the canal, which the Senate passed for regulating the Sand Beach harbor of refuge on Lake Huron.

I ask that the Secretary read the communication of the Secretary of War, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Kansas to it. The importance of acting immediately upon it is that navigation is now commencing, and it is found that there is no competent authority to regulate the passage of boats and to prevent injury to this important work, which has cost the Government about $3,000,000. The Senate will see from the papers submitted that it is very desirable that action should be had immediately to meet the opening of the canal this spring. I ask the Secretary to read the letter from the Secretary of War and the engineers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 12, 1884.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives, for the information of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, dated January 10, instant, submitting a copy of a communication from Lieut. Col. O. M. Poe, Corps of Engineers, with an accompanying draught of "An act for the government and control of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal, Michigan."

The views of Colonel Poe as to the importance of legislation by Congress looking to the protection and preservation of the great and valuable public works at the locality named, which are concurred in by the Chief of Engineers, have also the concurrence of this Department.

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a copy of a communication from Lieut. Col. O. M. Poe, Corps of Engineers, with inclosed draught of "An act for the government and control of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal, Michigan," and to commend the same to your consideration. Colonel Poe states the necessity for some action of Congress looking to the protection and preservation of the great and valuable public works at the locality named, and I concur in his views.

I beg, therefore, to recommend that the papers be sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the information of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and such action as the necessities of the case seem to require.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,
Chief of Engineers, Brig. and Bvt. Maj. Gen.

Hon. ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Detroit, Mich., December 10, 1883.

SIR: Experience has shown the great advantage derived from the operation of the act of Congress vesting in the Secretary of War the control of the harbor of refuge at Sand Beach, Lake Huron, Michigan, and establishing penalties for the non-observance of the law and the regulations promulgated thereunder.

The result has been to secure "the greatest good to the greatest number," without making the regulations at all onerous to the shipping interests.

The more costly and equally important improvement of Saint Mary's Falls

Canal, Michigan, which now represents an expenditure of nearly $3,000,000, is without the protection of any such specific law, and I deem it very desirable that legislation should be had at this session of Congress.

With this object in view I have the honor to transmit herewith the draught of an act which is intended to accomplish the purpose. It is modeled upon the act approved June 19, 1882, for the government and control of the harbor of refuge at Sand Beach, Lake Huron, Michigan, the language of which has been modified only so much as is necessary to adapt it to the work in question.

I have to request that, if approved, this draught be forwarded through the proper channels for such action as may be deemed proper.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. M. POE,

Lieut. Colonel of Engineers, &c., Bvt. Brig. Gen., U. S. A.

The CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, U. S. A.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas objects.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the bill goes upon the Calendar, then?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I give notice that after the introduction of bills I shall make a motion to consider the bill this morning.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred Senate Executive Document No. 28, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, being the report of the Inspector-General of the Army of the United States of an inspection of the Soldiers' Home at Washington, D. C., in compliance with the provisions of an act of Congress prescribing regulations for said home and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1883, and also a message of the President of the United States transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War relative to an appropriation for the Soldiers' Home, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, appropriating $20,000 for additional clerical force in the auditing department of the Treasury, to be used only in adjusting the amounts due the Soldiers' Home at Washington; which, on motion of Mr. SEWELL, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1014) for the relief of the corporation of Roman Catholic Clergymen of the State of Maryland, report back the bill and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject-matter of the bill having been referred to the Court of Claims by the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What disposition does the Senator from West Virginia propose of the bill?

Mr. KENNA. I do not know of any action to be had by the Senate with reference to it. The matter is before the Court of Claims, sent there by the committee of the House, and I presume that informally these papers might take the same course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the report is not that the bill has been sent under the authority of the act of last winter by the Committee on Claims of the Senate, but that the subject-matter has been sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. KENNA. I understand that the subject-matter has been sent there on precisely a similar bill, so that in fact the whole matter is before the Court of Claims. The bill may go on the Calendar, I presume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. KENNA. That might involve final action on the claim.

Mr. BECK. Let it go on the Calendar.

Mr. KENNA. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Committee on Claims, as has been stated by the Senator from West Virginia, has an official communication from the Committee on War Claims of the House, from which it appears that a bill identical in terms with the bill reported back by the Senator from West Virginia has been referred to the Court of Claims under the so-called Bowman act. It seems, therefore, that inasmuch as the whole matter is now before the Court of Claims, the bill had better be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears none, and the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2031) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Sibley, in the State of Missouri, to report it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB. There are a good many reasons why it is important that the bill should pass now. The inception of a great enterprise is to some extent dependent on it. While the bill is not what I think it should be, at the same time probably its passage now would result in a conference on the part of the two Houses and it may be perfected. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered now. It is a local matter.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope my colleague will allow the bill to go over until after we get through with the morning business. Then I shall have no objection to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 305) for the relief of Thomas T. Stratton, assignee of W. B. Woldran, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1727) to grant letter-carriers at free-delivery offices thirty days' leave of absence in each year, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Otis, administrator de bonis non of Roger A. Hiern, praying the payment of a certain amount of money allowed by the commissioners of claims on account of a steamboat sold to the Government by said Hiern, reported adversely thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The prayer of the petitioner will be denied and the committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the order denying the prayer of the petitioner is agreeing to the recommendation of the report. The Chair will state it the other way if it is preferred.

Mr. COCKRELL. The rule says the report shall be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection it will be ordered that the report be agreed to and the prayer of the petitioner denied.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1384) for the relief of James S. Clark & Co., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1570) for the relief of H. K. Belding, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Sallie Carroll, executrix and devisee of William T. Carroll, deceased, praying for compensation for timber and wood taken by the United States military authorities, and used in and about the forts erected for the defense of the city of Washington, D. C., submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2092) for the relief of Sallie Carroll; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1744) for the relief of Mrs. Martha L. Burch, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go on the Calendar until I can see the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2093) to provide for the appointment of an acting secretary of the Smithsonian Institution; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2094) to remove the political disabilities of Louis Marquart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2095) to remove the political disabilities of John L. Cowardin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLATT (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2096) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to rehear the application of Stephen V. Benét for patent for cartridges; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. GROOME introduced a bill (S. 2097) to incorporate the North Capitol and Glenwood Cemetery Horse Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence.

SAINT MARY'S FALLS CANAL, MICHIGAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. CONGER. Before taking up the Calendar I move to take up for present action the bill (S. 1988) for the government and control of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal, Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. INGALLS. The report having been made this morning, it requires unanimous consent, I suppose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly it does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not advised that the report was made this morning.

Mr. CONGER. The bill was placed on the Calendar this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill. Is there objection?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. HOAR. The bill has just been read, in the absence of the Chair for a few moments, for the information of the Senate. Perhaps under those circumstances it will not be necessary to read it through again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the reading of the bill at length, as in Committee of the Whole, will be dispensed with, it having just been read for information. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill, as I was not in when it was read, state briefly as he may, the general object and purpose of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. The report to the House of Representatives, which is printed and on the table, was read. The Senator did not probably hear it?

Mr. HARRIS. It was read before I came in.

Mr. CONGER. That report is a letter from the Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, accompanied by a bill, of which this is an exact copy, recommending its passage, to control the Saint Mary's Falls Canal. As I said before the Senator came in, it has also the approval of General Wright, the late eminent Chief of Engineers, and the bill was sent to the Department for the approval of the Department by General Poe, in charge of the department where the Saint Mary's Falls Canal is.

Mr. HARRIS. That statement is satisfactory to me so far as I have anything to say.

Mr. CONGER. It is an exact copy of the bill for the control of the harbor of refuge on Lake Huron, which the Senate and House of Representatives have passed and which is now a law. The necessity for the passage of this bill immediately is that when the State of Michigan last year turned over the canal to the General Government and it was accepted by the General Government, there was no law passed to regulate the canal, the law of Michigan on the subject not being in force under the United States. As the canal is about to be opened, it is very important that that work, which cost $3,000,000, should be under the immediate control of the General Government and its officers.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask the Senator from Michigan if he considers now as a fact that the canal is really the property and under the control of the Government at present?

Mr. CONGER. It was accepted by the Government, and officers have been appointed for superintending the canal; but there is no law which gives them any power as such officers to control the passage of boats and the mooring of them along the canal, and where they may be moored, or how they shall be passed. There is no law to prevent obstructions in the canal or the throwing in of ballast, or anything of that kind. The bill corresponds in all its features with the law which we passed in regard to the harbor of refuge on Lake Huron. It was prepared by the Department, and comes with the recommendation of all these officers. I introduced the bill, as prepared and sent here in the printed report of the Department which was read a few moments since.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 246, being the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations, will now be laid before the Senate under Rule VIII.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER]. He has an amendment to offer to this bill. It was read over yesterday evening and left at the head of the Calendar, in order that he might have an opportunity of offering the amendment this morning; but he advises me that he has not had time to prepare it. If there be no objection, under the circumstances I ask that this bill remain at the head of the Calendar, to be the first case to-morrow, so as to give the Senator from Michigan an opportunity of preparing the amendment he desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks that this bill be passed over, retaining its place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chairs hears none, and it is so ordered.

TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

The bill (S. 1544) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to timber depredations, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows.

"Every person who unlawfully cuts, or aids, or is employed in unlawfully cutting, or wantonly destroys, or procures to be wantonly destroyed, any timber standing upon the lands of the United States which in pursuance of law may be reserved or purchased for military or other purposes, or upon any Indian reservation, or lands belonging to or occupied by any tribe of Indians under authority of the United States, shall pay a fine of not more than $500, or be imprisoned not more than twelve months, or both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether that bill is intended to apply to Indians as well as to other persons. Is it intended to prevent Indians cutting timber on their own reservations?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will observe that the Revised Statutes apply to all other reservations, but omitted by accident Indian reservations. It is wanton and willful trespasses upon those reservations that are punished, and none others.

Mr. MORGAN. What classes of persons are punishable? Will the Secretary read the amendment again?

Mr. DAWES. It was not intended to extend to what the Senator suggests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs will be again reported.

The amendment was read.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose that it was the intention of the committee that an Indian might cut timber on an Indian reservation; still it is not so expressed in this particular language. Does the general law provide that Indians may cut timber on the land reserved to the tribes?

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator repeat his interrogatory?

Mr. MORGAN. Does the general law provide that Indians may cut timber on the lands reserved to the tribes?

Mr. DAWES. The general law provides that Indians under the charge of Indian agents may occupy and use the land on Indian reservations precisely as the Indian agent may direct. This would not reach such a case. It would only reach wanton and willful trespasses. This is prepared, it is proper to state, by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MORGAN. A wanton and willful trespass committed by an Indian on timber upon lands within an Indian reservation would not be punishable, under our existing system, in the Federal courts, for our laws, except where it is otherwise expressly provided, do not extend to the Indians on reservations. In the case to which I called the attention of the Senate recently, the case of the murder of Spotted Tail, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the Federal courts in Dakota had no jurisdiction to try an Indian for murder in that case, because he was not included within the criminal laws of the United States, and our jurisdiction of a criminal character did not extend to him. But if an Indian should commit a wanton depredation upon timber on an Indian reservation, this bill it seems would require that he should be punished in the courts of the United States, just as a white man would be.

Mr. DAWES. If an Indian belonging to some other reservation or an Indian separated from a tribe should invade an Indian reservation and commit a wanton trespass there, and could not be restrained by any moral restraint and could not be made answerable for the damages, I think he would be liable to prosecution and exposed to some light punishment under the discretionary power provided in this bill; but an Indian upon a reservation acting under the authority of the Indian agent or with the permission of the Indian agent could never be considered as committing a wanton or a willful trespass.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no amendment that I wish to offer to this bill with a view of improving it. I merely wanted to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to the extremely crude and unsatisfactory character of our laws with respect to the punishment of Indians for crimes.

Mr. DAWES. In this connection I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama, if I may in this way, to a very sweeping provision in the Indian appropriation bill touching on the matter to which he has alluded, a matter which it seems to the committee having it under consideration deserves the serious attention of all members. It has reference to this very matter of the commission of offenses by Indians. I think this bill is without objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1559) to define the title and duties of certain officers of the Medical Department of the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the title by striking out the words "define the title and duties" and inserting "change the designation and title" so as to read: "A bill to change the designation and title of certain officers of the Medical Department of the Army."

The amendment was agreed to.

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

The bill (S. 7) to authorize the payment of customs duties in legal-tender notes was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is reported adversely, and unless the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] desires——

Mr. BECK. I desire to have a vote on it, and I desire the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I object to its consideration.

Mr. BECK. Then I move to take it up, the objection to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do it because the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who made the adverse report is absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Whereupon the Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. BECK. I am entirely willing that it shall retain its place until the Senator from Vermont comes in. I introduced the bill to authorize the taking of legal-tender notes at the custom-houses. The Treasury Department is now doing it in violation of law; and I desire to legalize its action. The committee prefer that the Department should act in violation of law rather than in accordance with law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not open to debate.

Mr. BECK. I am willing that the bill shall retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill, and asks unanimous consent that it be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will not the Senator from Kentucky have the same right to make his motion at any time, whether the bill goes over now under objection or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He would have the same right to make the motion after the end of the morning business and before 2 o'clock, or at any other time, in fact, as the Chair thinks, under the new rules.

Mr. HOAR. Then I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BECK. Then I renew the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. Is it in order now to have the bill read for information? Several Senators do not know what the bill is. It has not yet been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair doubts whether it is in order on this motion, but the Chair will have it read for information if there be no objection. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter legal-tender notes of the United States shall be received at par for all customs duties for all sums required to be paid therefor by any person, firm, or corporation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of this bill notwithstanding the objection.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I desire to announce that I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MITCHELL (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. I inadvertently voted; I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. COKE. My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is absent in Texas, and is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. My colleague would vote "yea" if here.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Beck,	George,	Morgan,	Van Wyck,
Brown,	Gorman,	Pendleton,	Vest,
Call,	Groome,	Pugh,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Ransom,	Williams.
Coke,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Garland,	Lamar,	Vance,

NAYS—26.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Allison,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Hill,	Palmer,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt,

ABSENT—28.

Anthony,	Dolph,	Jones of Florida,	Miller of N. Y.,
Bayard,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Mitchell,
Bowen,	Farley,	Kenna,	Pike,
Butler,	Gibson,	Lapham,	Plumb,
Camden,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Mahone,	Slater,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Maxey,	Voorhees.

So the motion was not agreed to.

CATHERINE SCHOOLS.

The bill (S. 750) granting a pension to Catherine Schools was announced as next in order.

Mr. JACKSON. That is an adverse report, and I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

JOHN M'NELLIS.

The bill (S. 806) for the relief of John McNellis was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is reported adversely, and I suppose there is no desire to have it considered.

Mr. BECK. It was unanimously reported adversely by the Committee on Finance, but the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] asked that it might go on the Calendar until he looked at it. I do not know what he thinks now.

Mr CULLOM. I hope the case will be allowed to pass over. I do not know whether I shall object to the report or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over.

B. JENNINGS.

The bill (S. 510) for the relief of B. Jennings was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $3,114.66 to B. Jennings, late register of the land office of the United States at Oregon City, to reimburse him for money expended between June 1, 1859, and December 31, 1860, for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses during that period not heretofore allowed or paid.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SLATER February 19, 1884:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 510) for the relief of B. Jennings, respectfully report:

That the claimant, B. Jennings, was register at the United States land office at Oregon City, in the State of Oregon, and between April 1, 1859, and January, 1861, he paid out of his private funds for clerical service in his said office the sum of $3,114.66, as shown by vouchers forwarded to the General Land Office under date of December 17, 1860, in obedience to a circular letter of the Department of date August 6, 1860.

This claim was reported to Congress by the Department and its payment recommended in 1861.

The history of this claim is very fully set forth in a letter addressed to Hon. H. M. Teller, Secretary of the Interior, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of date February 6, 1884, from which the following is taken:

"By circular instructions from this office, dated August 16, 1860 (copy herewith), registers and receivers were directed to transmit tabulated statements of amounts paid by them for clerical services rendered under acts of Congress approved August 20, 1818 (vol. 3, p. 466, U. S. Stats.), and August 18, 1856 (vol. 11, p. 91, U. S. Stats.).

"In compliance with said instructions, B. Jennings, register of the land office at Oregon City, presented a statement, supported by the proper vouchers (copies herewith), from which it will be seen that the several amounts paid by him aggregate $3,114.67. On January 19, 1861, the then Commissioner of this office addressed a communication to the acting Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to pay this claim, and December 21, 1880, this office again recommended the payment of the above amount.

"The extraordinary services rendered by the clerks employed by Mr. Jennings were occasioned by the large number of donation claims passed upon in the Oregon City office, there being of this class 9,040, besides the selection of school and other lands as set forth in a statement made to this office by Mr. Jennings on December 17, 1860. (See copy herewith.)

"Mr. Jennings has complied with the requirements of the Department by filing the necessary accounts and vouchers. I am of opinion that the claim is a just one."

In a subsequent communication of the same date, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner further says:

"Referring further to my report of the 6th instant on Senate bill No. 510, for the relief of B. Jennings, late register at Oregon City, Oreg., I have the honor to state that neither the register nor receiver at that office had at any time public moneys of the United States in their possession applicable to payment of salaries of clerks, and that the payments by Mr. Jennings for such services must therefore have been paid from his private funds."

It is unquestioned that additional and extraordinary clerical services were required in bringing up the business of this office, that such services were secured and paid for by Mr. Jennings, and that the Government has had the full benefit of these services and has never reimbursed Mr. Jennings therefor.

Therefore your committee recommend that the bill should pass.

LAND OFFICE, OREGON CITY, December 17, 1860.

SIR: Herewith please find vouchers No. 1, Thomas J. McCarver; No. 2, Samuel Holmes; No. 3, Thomas J. McCarver; No. 4, D. B. Hannah; No. 5, Edward T. Jennings; No. 6, William L. White, and No. 7, William B. Campbell, and tabular statement on account of reasonable compensation for additional clerical services and extraordinary expenses in the land office at Oregon City.

Your circular letter of 16th August last requires a statement of the kind of service rendered. The services are various, consequent upon the large arrearage of labor growing out of the donations to actual settlers in Oregon.

This communication has been delayed some five or six weeks, that I might be able to give in detail all and every species of extraordinary labor growing out of donations. After this delay, with diligent investigation I find myself no nearer accomplishing the end than when I first began.

Bearing in mind the terms of the act of 1818, the allowance thereby made for clerical assistance, I desired to ascertain the aggregate area of land the Government had given away, thereby depriving this office of the percentage contemplated by that act for clerical aid. The record shows the number of claimants, but does not show conflicts, area, or any of the existing embarrassments. Upon the receipt of your circular above referred to, 16th August last, with the assistance of the clerk, Mr. White, I commenced searching records, maps, and papers, determined to give a full history of all the facts connected with the duties and labors in this office, but finding the search so materially trespassing upon the more important business of the office, I was compelled to abandon the further search, and submit the case with a brief statement. The records show 8,040 donation claims upon surveyed lands, and over 1,000 upon unsurveyed lands; many of the latter, however, have been located upon the respective townships in which they reside after the surveys were completed.

I have examined about 5,000 claims, and if those not examined will compare with those examined, will embrace about 2,400,000 acres of land. This land at $1.25 per acre would have been a neat little sum in the Treasury of the United States. An office in the receipt of that amount of money from the sales of public lands, the probability is there would be but little difficulty in obtaining appropriations for clerical aid, fuel, lights, and other expenses in the land office; but as Congress saw fit to donate lands to actual settlers in Oregon, it is fair to presume a consideration; if so, the Government is as much under obligation to perfect the title to their claims as if they had paid for their land in cash.

The additional labor growing out of donations, being an excess of labor over and above the ordinary sales of public lands:

1. Filing, recording, and platting notifications.
2. Taking primary proofs, filing and recording the same.
3. Taking the final proofs, filing and recording the same.
4. Adjusting conflicts of boundaries.
5. Change of boundaries, to avoid conflicts, or to include their improvements.
6. To hear and determine difficulties between husband and wife as to the division of their claims.
7. Selection of lands by university commissioners in broken legal subdivisions, made so by donation claims.
8. Selection of lands by superintendent of common schools in lieu of sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, taken by donation.
9. Furnishing abstracts of notifications to surveyor-general of claims entitled to survey.
10. Additional labor in tract-books.
11. Additional labor in making donation certificates accompanied by special plats.
12. Copying a map of papers preparatory to making donation certificates.
13. Numerous correspondence.

The first, second, third, seventh, and eighth will not longer be burdensome to this office. The fourth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth, the labor will be immense, for which no correct estimate can be made.

The labor above enumerated embraces the character of service rendered by the clerks employed by me. One class of service, however, not mentioned is that performed by E. T. Jennings, as notary public, without charge to parties visiting the office.

I most respectfully ask your assistance in procuring an appropriation to meet the expenses and liabilities thus incurred.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. JENNINGS, Register.

COMMISSIONER GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Washington, D. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUGUSTUS J. CASSARD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 63) authorizing Augustus J. Cassard to accept a gold medal conferred upon him by the Government of France.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator who reported that measure tell us who Mr. Cassard is? The resolution does not say.

Mr. WILSON. There is a brief report. The Calendar does not show that any report accompanies the joint resolution, but there is a brief report, which I ask to have read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. WILSON February 19, 1884:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the application of Augustus J. Cassard to be permitted to accept a gold medal conferred on him by the Government of France, submits the following report:

The Secretary of State, in a letter of January 19, 1884, responding to inquiries relative to the facts in this case, says:

"That for eight months prior to February, 1881, Mr. Cassard, our consul at Tampico, rendered valuable service to the French Government by taking charge of its consular archives and interests, there being during that period no French consul in that district. For this service Mr. Cassard could receive no compensation, and therefore the French Government desired to present a medal as a mark of its appreciation thereof."

A gold medal has been prepared by the French Government and forwarded through the proper diplomatic channels, but as it can not be delivered to or accepted by Mr. Cassard without the permission of Congress, the committee present the joint resolution accompanying this report and recommend its passage.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRESPASSES ON INDIAN LANDS.

The bill (S. 1545) to amend section 2148 of the Revised Statutes in relation to trespassers on Indian lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 10, after the word "dollars," to strike out "and" and insert "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 11, after the word "year," to insert "or both, in the discretion of the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 13, after the word "dollars," to strike out "and not less than $500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 15, after the word "years," to strike out "nor less than one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to hear the bill read now as it is amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2148 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows, namely:

"Every person who, without authority of law, enters and shall be found upon any Indian lands, tribal reservation, or lands specially set apart for Indian purposes shall, for the first offense, upon conviction thereof, pay a fine of not more than $500, or be imprisoned at hard labor for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court; and for every subsequent offense shall, upon conviction thereof, pay a fine of not more than $1,000, and be imprisoned at hard labor for not more than two years; and the wagons, teams, and outfit of such person or persons so offending shall be seized and delivered to the proper United States officer, and be proceeded against by libel in the proper court, and forfeited, one-half to the informer and the other half to the United States: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to immigrants or travelers peaceably passing through such Indian lands, tribal reservations, or lands especially set apart for Indian purposes, without committing any willful trespass or injury to person or property."

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to me that is a very harsh bill, to punish a man for trespassing on an Indian reservation by a fine of $500 and imprisonment. He may have no evil intent at all. If he is merely found upon the reservation without a license he is to be fined and imprisoned to that extent. It seems to be a very harsh provision indeed. I should like the Senator who reported the bill to indicate what policy is to be subserved, what end of justice is to be attained by the passage of a measure like this.

Mr. DAWES. The existing law is in these words:

SEC. 2148. If any person who has been removed from the Indian country shall thereafter at any time return or be found within the Indian country, he shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000.

Under the provision of law there have been combinations, associations of individuals invading the Indian Territory, who have been brought up and fined $1,000, and taken the poor debtor's oath and gone back and repeated over and over again the offense, because they can be relieved from any penalty by simply taking the poor debtor's oath. The object of this bill is to provide some penalty that will reach and punish such a man, and the bill as amended puts it entirely within the discretion of the court within certain maximum limits. As originally drawn there was a minimum limit, but it was thought by the committee that there might be cases where there should be nothing more than a nominal fine, and there would be cases and there have been cases of such an aggravated character that a fine of $500 or imprisonment for the maximum time would be a just and proper punishment.

The United States has been, as the Senator knows, defied over and over again by a band of lawless persons invading the Indian Territory and attempting to establish colonies there, leading deluded people from their homes in the neighboring States with their substance down upon land in the Indian Territory only to be driven off from the ground by the United States authorities, and to suffer great loss and privation—innocent persons, at the head of whom would be a man who has gone through three or four processes of having the fine of $1,000 imposed upon him, and then taking the poor debtor's oath and going back into the States and finding a company of confiding and innocent persons to follow his lead. It is to meet that case.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understand the reading of the bill——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has once spoken on this question. If there be no objection the Senator from Alabama will proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understood the reading of the bill, if a person is found unlawfully——

Mr. DAWES. No; if he enters unlawfully is the phraseology.

Mr. MORGAN. All persons are prohibited from entering Indian reservations without a license or permission from the agent under the general law. It seems to me that the committee have not been very happy in the selection of phrases to define the offense they wish to punish. Any invasion of the territory of Indians with a view to get their lands or occupy their country or any conspiracy to invade it ought to be punishable in the manner this bill provides; but the mere entry upon the land not with an intent to invade or not with intent to occupy, but by misadventure, ought not to be an offense in the meaning of the law; and it seems to me the Senator ought to take into consideration the modification of this language so as not to include people of this kind.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to say——

Mr. MORGAN. I have said all I desired to say.

Mr. DAWES. The committee considered the propriety of inserting the word "willfully."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has once addressed the Senate on this question. Is there objection to his again speaking?

Mr. DAWES. I thought I was using up some of my friend's time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice of the Senate does not allow the substitution of time. Is there objection to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding?

Mr. MORGAN. To give us both a chance to understand it, I object to the further consideration of the bill this morning.

Mr. DAWES. No Senator can be more desirous than I am to get this bill as it ought to be, and I will state to the Senator why the word "willfully" was left out——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his objection?

Mr. MORGAN. For the purpose of a statement.

Mr. DAWES. I will state why the word "willfully" was not inserted. The bill was drawn by those who administer the criminal law, and the committee toned it down in the manner indicated by the amendments, taking away the minimum in all cases for the purpose of reaching cases that had no aggravation. Coming to consider the propriety of inserting in this bill the word "willfully," we were met by the suggestion that it would be impossible to show that a man willfully and intentionally committed this trespass upon the territory, and that it might embarrass very much the administration of the law; on the other hand, with no minimum of penalty it could safely be left to the discretion of the court. If the Senator does not think that wise, I am sure I have not the slightest objection to inserting the word "willfully" as a qualifying term.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, the Chair understands.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator from Alabama will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the objection shall not displace the bill on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to make a single suggestion before the bill goes over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the Senator from Connecticut proceeding.

Mr. PLATT. If this is intended to punish a person who unlawfully enters upon Indian territory I think the bill had better say so rather than to say "without authority of law." I do not know that there would be any difference in the two phrases, and yet as it says "without authority of law" and then provides that that phrase "shall not apply to emigrants or travelers," it might be held to include persons who went into the territory upon a perfectly lawful undertaking, but who had no special authority of law to go there.

Mr. DAWES. If I may be allowed to continue the explanation——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Massachusetts again addressing the Senate? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think it is open to that criticism for this reason: Everybody must obtain permission to go upon Indian territory if he wants to go there with authority of law, and every one who does not have that permission is there unlawfully. The peculiarity of the phraseology is to meet that case. I wish the Senator from Alabama would let the bill pass if he is satisfied, or, if he thinks it best, move to insert the word "willfully."

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over till to-morrow without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

A. H. VON LUETTWITZ.

The bill (S. 556) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz was announced as next in order.

Mr. SEWELL. In the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], who made the adverse report in this case, I ask that the bill go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

GEORGIA COTTON CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 601) to provide for hearing and determining the claims of the State of Georgia for captured and abandoned property of said State seized by the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. MANDERSON. In the absence of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] who desired that that bill should be placed on the Calendar notwithstanding the adverse report, I ask that it be passed over, not to lose its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MADISON FEMALE INSTITUTE.

The bill (S. 1130) for the relief of the Madison Female Institute, located at Richmond, Ky., was announced as next in order.

Mr. BECK. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Claims to that bill. I ask that it shall be passed over for the present without losing its place on the Calendar. The report goes on the assumption that $10,000 was paid to the trustees. There is a mistake about that, and the War Department says it is a mistake. I think I shall have the facts by to-morrow, and when I get them I shall move the recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Claims to consider the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to passing over the bill, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

SARAH E. E. PERINE.

The bill (S. 1240) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased, $132,493.23, being the amount due to William Perine, as found by the Selfridge board, for building the light-draught monitor Naubuc and the iron tugboats Triana and Maria.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the report on that case be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PIKE February 20, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1240) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of William Perine, having considered the same, make the following report:

That the claimant is the widow and administratrix of the estate of the late William Perine, of New York city.

That on the 2d day of April, 1863, said William Perine entered into a contract with the United States to build the light-draught monitor Naubuc, and on the 20th day of December, 1863, he entered into a contract with the United States to build the iron tug-boats Triana and Maria. Soon after the contracts were made the Navy Department began ordering radical changes and alterations in the construction of the vessels. The making of these changes by the contractor as required involved him in great delay; in the mean time, in 1864, the price of materials and labor largely advanced, a state of facts that could not have been contemplated by the contractor at the time of making his contracts or in any way guarded against. The Government would not release him, the vessels were wanted and must be had, and the Department made direct promises that he would be fully remunerated for all losses.

In the summer of 1864 orders were sent to Perine to stop work on the Naubuc, and it was not until the middle of December following that he was allowed to proceed with his contract on that vessel, and during the time of this suspension the plans were changed so that he was directed to convert the Naubuc into a torpedo-boat instead of a light-draught monitor.

It was during this time that the greatest increase of price of labor and material occurred. Workmen had to be discharged when the order came to stop work, and when re-employed it was at the advanced rates; changes also of material were made which necessitated purchasing at the then increased market price.

On account of these delays caused by alterations made by the Navy Department, the completion of these vessels was delayed until long after the time named in several contracts, and the cost largely exceeded contract price.

An appeal was made to Congress for relief, and on March 9, 1865, the Senate passed the following resolution:

"In the Senate of the United States, March 9, 1865.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to organize a board of not less than three competent persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and determine how much the vessels of war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price, and the allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate at its next session. None but those who have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered."

Under said resolution the honorable Secretary of the Navy appointed a board, consisting of Commodore Thomas O. Selfridge, Chief-Engineer Alex. Henderson, and Paymaster C. H. Eldridge, which convened at the Brooklyn navy-yard June 5, 1865, and continued in session for more than six months.

William Perine, coming under the terms of said resolution, presented his claim to said board, with the vouchers and the evidence in support of it, and was allowed the following sums, namely:

Light-draught monitor Naubuc	$36,533 44
Iron tug-boat Triana (hull and machinery)	52,472 81
Iron tug-boat Maria (hull and machinery)	43,586 98
Total	132,593 23

See Senate Ex. Doc. No. 18, first session Thirty-ninth Congress.

On January 31, 1866, this report was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, which committee on March 22, 1866, made a report thereon (No. 45, first session Thirty-ninth Congress), accompanying a bill for the payment of the awards thus made. In said report the committee say:

"From June till December last the board organized by the Secretary of the Navy, under the Senate resolution, composed of eminent officers of the Navy, was engaged in hearing evidence and investigating the claims of these parties. That investigation seems to have been fairly, carefully, and thoroughly made. It was by officers of the Department, and the award, which the committee believe to be substantially right, should be adopted as the basis of relief to the parties, and therefore the committee report the accompanying bill."

One of the awards has been paid by joint resolution of March 30, 1867, 15 Stats., 353, by which Donahue, Ryan, and Secor were paid $179,000 for losses sustained by them in constructing the Comanche. Amount allowed by the board, $179,993.80.

In addition, the following special acts have been passed to relieve contractors in similar cases, to wit:

Act of February 18, 1873, to relieve the heirs of George C. Bester, $125,000, 17 Stats., 733.

Act of June 1, 1872, to pay Charles W. Whitney $50,000, 17 Stats., 671.

Act of June 10, 1872, to pay J. S. Underhill $23,310.75, 17 Stats., 691.

Act of March 2, 1875, to pay Daniel S. Mershon, jr., $46,715.08, 18 Stats., 635.

In view of the facts that the above claims were examined by a committee appointed specially to investigate such claims, and that the sum of $132,593.23 was found to be rightfully due William Perine for extra labor and expense on his contracts (see report of the Secretary of Navy, Thirty-ninth Congress, first session, Senate Ex. Doc. No. 18), the committee recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to this bill going over without prejudice, holding its place under Rule VIII, but I should like to have time to look a little more carefully at the report before I allow its passage. I would therefore ask that the bill go over without prejudice, holding its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. It appears here that a board organized in 1865 reported that this claim ought to be paid. Now, I should like to inquire why it is that no effort has been made to obtain payment of it from 1865 to the present time. I think that might as well be explained this morning; or I should like to know whether efforts have been made from 1865 up to the present time to obtain the passage of a resolution or bill for the payment of the claim. The sum of $133,000 is quite a little item, and I should suppose that some measures would have been taken by the parties who supposed that they were entitled to the money under that board's ruling to obtain the payment of it.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. President, this Mr. Perine became deeply involved in consequence of the large expenditure incurred in building these vessels, and in consequence of the numerous changes made by the Government in the progress of the erection of the monitors and torpedo-boats. He had to encumber all his property to obtain means, in consequence of which he failed and finally died. The claimant here is his widow. The reason why the claim was not prosecuted was in consequence of these embarrassments and the death of the principal claimant. The committee were unanimous and thoroughly satisfied that the claim was due and had not been paid. Being satisfied of that, they thought this was a sufficient apology why the statute of limitations should not be applied. Indeed there is no statute of limitations against a claim of this kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place under Rule VIII.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire when was the application made to Congress for relief in this case? How long ago?

Mr. PIKE. Three Congresses ago, as I believe, and it has never been unfavorably reported, but has gone off without receiving the assent of both branches.

Mr. HARRIS. Then after the finding of the board there were fifteen or sixteen years before any application was made to Congress for relief in this case.

Mr. PIKE. It was some time. I do not remember the number of years.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the bill go over as I have indicated.

Mr. PIKE. The report has been read to-day, and it states that in 1865 several of these claims were passed upon by the board appointed to carry out a resolution of the Senate, and some of them have since been acted upon and paid. There is no objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee if the bill will not lose its place.

Mr. HARRIS. That was my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6094) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 1127) to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the House of Representatives sent over to the Senate in February House bill 3967 on this same subject; I do not remember the number in the order of business. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill in lieu of the Senate bill on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas, pending the consideration of the Senate bill, moves to proceed to the consideration under Rule IX of the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not open to debate.

Mr. COKE. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. I ask if his motion is substantially to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill?

Mr. PLUMB. That is what it amounts to, though it retains its position as a House bill.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senate bill is a special order, I believe, and the unfinished business. The motion of the Senator from Kansas is that we consider the House bill on the same subject instead.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion requires unanimous consent, the Chair thinks. The Chair will ask the consent of the Senate. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that House bill 3967 be substituted as a special order for consideration in the place of the present special order Senate bill 1127, and that Senate bill 1127 take its place on the Calendar of General Orders. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. PLUMB. If in order, I move that the reading of the bill in full be dispensed with, and that it be read by sections for amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the bill be read by sections for amendment, as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The first section will be read.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that I desire to say simply that in moving this substitution I desire to avoid as many points of controversy as possible. The House bill 3967 was the subject of extended debate in the House and was passed at the close of that debate; and as the result of the debate what was section 4 of that bill was stricken out which provided for the employment of surgeons at the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture under certain circumstances.

Mr. VEST. Section 5 of the Senate bill?

Mr. PLUMB. Section 5 of the Senate bill. So far as I am concerned myself, in order to be reasonably certain of getting some legislation, I am willing that the bill shall be passed as it came from the House, leaving out section 4 of the House bill or section 5 of the Senate bill.

I desire to say further that so far as I am concerned I shall not debate this bill unless I am compelled to do so in some way in the course of its consideration. With this section out, it simply provides in substance for an extended, comprehensive, and authentic investigation. I do not think in the present condition of things or in any condition of things that can possibly exist in this country such an investigation can be otherwise than productive of good. As the matters now stand the British Government has an interdict against our cattle to this extent: they are required to be slaughtered in the yards in which they are landed; they are not permitted to be driven into the interior at all. That makes them worth in round numbers $15 per head less than cattle which are not thus quarantined. The cattle from Canada, for instance, upon whatever ground it may be placed, are permitted to be driven into the interior of Great Britain, and are consequently worth $15 a head more for the same class and weight of cattle than the American cattle are.

It has been urged with reference to this bill that we are simply giving currency to reports adverse to our cattle, and that has come to me from sources which are entitled to and receive my highest respect; but what Congress knows or what Congress says is a very small portion of what the country knows or what the country says, and it is impossible that Congress should in any way by any action of its own convey to the British public or to the British authorities an idea of soundness upon the part of our cattle unless that is accompanied by some investigation which possesses respect by reason of its authority and the character of the men engaged in it. If Congress to-day were to pass unanimously an act or a resolution stating that no disease prevailed in this country, it would not lift the interdict against our cattle abroad at all. It is, therefore, incumbent on us to take some other measure, and it is useless to disguise the fact that pleuro-pneumonia has had an existence in this country if it has not now. It can not be disguised, either, that the highest veterinary authority in this country has recently stated, and it has been stated in the public prints devoted to the protection and promotion of the cattle interest of this country, that that disease did prevail here.

It is also stated, and I believe it to be true as it has been stated on this floor and elswhere, that other diseases prevail among cattle in this country, not seriously perhaps, but to that extent which makes it necessary that the General Government or some proper authority shall adopt measures to segregate from the great body of the cattle to be transported abroad such cattle as may by any possibility have any of these contagious or communicable diseases. When that is done we may reasonably expect to be relieved from the foreign quarantine. Until that is done, not only will the quarantine continue to exist, but we may at any time be expected to be confronted with a stricter quarantine than already exists. If no disease exists in this country, how can it be better determined than by an investigation such as this bill will cause? It will be an investigation, not by a State government interested, perhaps, in the question from a local standpoint, but it will be under the authority of the General Government, presumably by men not only qualified to determine the actual facts as they exist, but at the same time without any local influence or bias which would either determine them against the fact or which would in any way qualify the judgment they might render.

I can not conceive myself of any interest in this country opposed to the passage of this bill. On the other hand, all the principal cattle associations of the country have advocated its passage. The men who want to sell their cattle in the home market, the men who want to sell them in foreign markets, the men who are interested in the uninterrupted course of trade in this great commodity, the men who want the highest prices, and who, on the other hand, want protection against the irruption into their yards of diseased cattle brought from abroad or from other portions of this country, all ask for this legislation. There is a singular unanimity of sentiment among cattle producers in favor of legislation such as has been proposed, and even of more stringent legislation than is embraced in the House bill.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], with that care for the interests of that great State which always characterizes him, has proposed an amendment to which I see no objection. When the proper time comes I shall be willing, so far as I may, to consent that it shall be incorporated as part of this bill; not the entire amendment proposed by him, but a part of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the situation of the question. The bill when it was before the Senate on a former occasion was read, and when it went back to the Calendar of General Orders there had been offered and was pending, on section 3, page 3 of the present print of the bill, an amendment by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. The pending question before the Senate, as shown by the Journal and the RECORD and according to the recollection of the Chair, is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the third section of the bill. The amendment will be read, so that the Senate may understand precisely what the pending question is.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, after the word "disease," in line 23, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

And to insert in lieu thereof——

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understood that the Senator from Kansas proposed that the House bill be taken up in lieu of the Senate bill. I find no such amendment in the bill I have in my possession, called House bill 3967, and, if I understood the Chair aright, this is an amendment reported from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a reprint of the House bill. On the 12th of March, 1884, the amendment reported by the committee on the 10th of March was withdrawn, and the bill was ordered to be reprinted with certain amendments proposed by the committee and the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. The RECORD shows that the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]—and that conforms to the recollection of the Chair—then offered the amendment which the Secretary is now reporting. The Secretary will report the words proposed to be inserted as well as the words proposed to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. The words to be inserted are:

And whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation fails to make provisions for its extinction, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extinction of the disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as is dangerous to the animal interests of the country, in quarantine, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

Mr. COKE. I understood that this amendment was not to be insisted on now.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to have the amendment divided and the question taken first on striking out. I think really there are two amendments, one to strike out and one to insert, because the matter to be inserted is not in any way cognate to or on the same subject as that which is stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). To call for a division is the Senator's right under the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The purpose is to substitute for the House bill the bill and amendments as reported by the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. That is what we have already done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then why have this striking out?

Mr. PLUMB. This was an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. If I understood the Senator who has charge of the bill, he is satisfied to strike out all that the committee has stricken out, and is also satisfied that the words proposed by the committee to be inserted shall not be inserted.

Mr. PLUMB. I am willing to strike out that portion which the committee strikes out, and not to insert the other matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on striking out from line 23 to line 28 of section 3.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on inserting the words which have been read in lieu of the matter stricken out.

The motion to insert was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 10, after the word "of," line 1, it is proposed to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred;" so as to read:

SEC. 10. That the sum of $500,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Do I understand that the Committee on Agriculture have reported that $500,000 is necessary to start this machinery?

Mr. PLUMB. The Committee on Agriculture reported in favor of an appropriation of $500,000, or so much thereof as might be necessary. As far as that part of it is concerned I will say, however, that if anybody is disposed to contest it, and if the Senator or any one else prefers the original sum, I shall withdraw the amendment on behalf of the committee, if I have the power.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have not examined this bill lately very carefully and do not know all the provisions it contains or what interpretation may be placed upon many of them; but inasmuch as this is only a scheme of investigation, and I think that is all that has been claimed for it by the chairman of the committee, it seems to me that the sum of a quarter of a million dollars will be amply sufficient to commence the investigation, the purpose being to establish a bureau of animal industry and employ twenty inspectors, whose sole business it shall be to investigate into the condition of affairs that exist in every State. I take it that those gentlemen when appointed will strive very earnestly to earn their money and to perpetuate their power and functions. I think it is not necessary to appropriate so large a sum of money as is proposed by the Senate committee for such a purpose.

While I am on my feet and while the amendment is pending, perhaps it would be as well for me to say all that I wish to say in regard to the whole measure. I do not know what necessity there is for legislation of this character. We know what alarm was spread broadcast over this country within the past three or four months, according to the lights we now have, without any cause whatever, for no pleuro-pneumonia is found to exist anywhere; and the foot-and-mouth disease about which we heard so much a few years ago, that the State of Kansas desired an appropriation of $50,000 to stamp out in that State, on investigation was found not to exist; and in fact no disease of a virulent character exists anywhere in our country. It seems to be the opinion on the other side of the water, where we market very largely our surplus meat product, that disease does exist. And how do they gain that information? Simply from such agents as it is the purpose of this bill to employ.

Two years ago no protest was made at the English ports against the introduction of cattle from this country; but upon statements made by the Agricultural Department from some of its agents, by excitement all over the country, by untruthful statements regarding the condition of the cattle and hog industry of this country, the British Government was impelled to pass laws. Those laws restricted certain countries, certain districts, from the importation of cattle into England. They were called infected districts, and on the testimony we ourselves furnished the United States was called an infected district, and thereafter, under an order issued by a department of that government, American cattle were impounded at the port of arrival, the Senator from Kansas says at a disadvantage and a loss to the people of this country of more than $15 per head.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether he does not speak from practical experience as an exporter and shipper of cattle.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Somewhat. I have this further to say, that up to this hour, as I have the best authority for saying, there has never been an animal shipped from the United States of America landed at a British port which was afflicted with pleuro-pneumonia or with the foot-and-mouth disease or any other disease which imperiled England's herds of cattle. It was one of the means the British Government has taken to protect the cattle industry of its own country. I do not criticise it. I find no fault with it. It is a matter for themselves to deal with. If they prefer dearer food for their people and better prices for the agricultural products of their country, it is for them to decide.

But there is a condition existing among cattle shipped from this country to the other which is not one of perfect health. Many Senators know that if you take an animal from the State of Texas, for instance, and ship it by long and continuous rail travel to the port of New York or Philadelphia or Baltimore, place that animal on board a steamship, exposed as it must be necessarily to severe storms, to change of air, to cold winds and different temperatures, it does engender in the animal a certain kind of disease which perhaps affects both the lungs and the throat. It can only be called a severe cold. Many of the animals reaching the English ports have been condemned because it was declared that they were affected with grievous disease, and although the disease itself upon investigation did not show it to be a virulent disease, in proof of the statement they assumed to make they called forward as witnesses the testimony of the American authorities that disease existed all over this country.

Mr. President, I believe the effect of this bill will simply be to multiply these cases; will simply be to discredit our own product in every market where we deal. The German Government have absolutely prohibited the American hog product from their ports. They found a certain disease among the hogs of this country. It exists there and in every other country in a tenfold worse form than it does here; yet it furnished an excuse.

All the British Government wants is an excuse to absolutely prohibit even the reception of our cattle at their ports. After the investigations that have taken place on this subject, when in reality not a single trace of disease exists anywhere among the cattle of this broad land that is at all alarming, I think it is exceedingly unwise for this Government to appropriate $250,000 for the purpose of sending out twenty inspectors, whose whole duty it will be to find it, and who if they fail to find it will be immediately dismissed as being of no further service. I think it exceedingly unwise to pursue this system of legislation.

I quite agree with the honorable Senator from Kansas when the alarm was spreading as to a disease existing in the State of Kansas. I know very well that in this country one of the great industries is cattle raising, and I know what the effect would be if a disease of this character should become very widespread; but I have found that there is no one so much interested as the owners of the herds and their neighbors the owners of neighboring herds and the States themselves where this great cattle industry is carried on. I do not believe there is a State in this Union but what will take immediate steps for the purpose of suppressing disease at whatever cost. But that is entirely different from conferring powers on twenty inspectors, many of whom would have no particular knowledge of the disease they were to inspect or of the duties they were called on to perform. They will simply be furnishing more and more erroneous information upon which to base the absolute refusal of other governments to receive our products at all.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I concur most fully in the remarks made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], and congratulate myself that a gentleman of his great intelligence and large practical experience in the business of raising and dealing in stock is here to give testimony before the Senate as to the effect and probable operation of this bill. I have given a good deal of attention to this bill, to the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to the report of the veterinary surgeons to the Treasury Department, and have examined all the literature on the subject within my reach, and I do not believe that a more pernicious bill to the great stock-raising interests of this country can be constructed than the one before us now. It ought to be entitled "A bill to provide for slandering and depreciating the value of the great stock interest of the United States." That this will be its effect is absolutely certain.

Now, Mr. President, take the consular reports. Here is Consular Report No. 38, with a very elaborate report from consuls resident in England. It will be remembered that the professed object of this bill is to give our cattle and other stock exported to foreign countries clean bills of health in order to insure for them good prices. Here is a report of the consul resident at Liverpool. He gives the losses by cattle disease in England under the heading, "Progress of foot-and-mouth disease in Great Britain in 1883." He gives the inroads of the diseases in each month of the year, and the total number of cattle attacked for the period given is 199,612.

One hundred and ninety-nine thousand six hundred and twelve cases of foot-and-mouth disease right where we are sending the bulk of our cattle exports for sale. It has not been pretended that a single case of foot-and-mouth disease has gone from this country to Europe, except such cases as were contracted by cattle that were healthy when they left our shores but were carried over in vessels which brought diseased cattle here and became diseased in crossing the ocean because the ships carrying them had not been disinfected. It is not pretended that any disease has been exported from this country to Europe in any other way; it is not pretended that a single case of pleuro-pneumonia has ever under any circumstances gone from America to any foreign country.

I have searched the consular reports; I have searched the agricultural reports; I have looked into all the literature on this subject. I find it asserted in one of the reports of the veterinary surgeon of the Agricultural Department that it is not pretended that any case of pleuro-pneumonia ever left this country for Europe, and that no case of foot-and-mouth disease has ever been carried to Europe from the United States except those cases that were contracted on board of English ships which had brought infected cattle to this country and had not been disinfected before our cattle were put upon them.

These being the facts, no disease ever having been carried from this country to Europe, why is it that our cattle are quarantined and put at a disadvantage when they are landed in England, as we are informed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]? While Canadian cattle are driven into the interior, ours must be slaughtered upon the wharves and are not allowed to be carried into the interior. Why is this? Certainly it is not because England has suffered from disease imported from this country. The cause of it is to be found, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] said, in the reports of our own executive department.

Speaking of the diseases of hogs which cause our hog product to be excluded from Germany, here is part of a letter and a dispatch which bears on that subject. I read from the argument of Mr. Emory Storrs on this subject:

Referring to the correspondence between Mr. Morton and the Secretary of State, as published in the report made quite recently by the President to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, I first quote from a letter addressed by Mr. Morton to Mr. Frelinghuysen, under date of February 28, 1882, in which he says.

Here is the letter:

"I must state that the renewal of the objection made to the importation of American pork is not to be attributed solely to the hostile influence of the minister of commerce and of those who have adverse private interests in the matter, but mainly to the publication in some American papers of supposed fatal cases of trichinosis. These reports, which have been circulated, unfortunately, by the American Correspondence, a New York Franco-American weekly sheet, printed partly in French, are copied by the French papers, and its paragraphs upon American trichinosis have received a rather wide circulation. I inclose herewith, for your information, two of these paragraphs, which appeared in the Correspondence of January 28 and February 11.

"Many people have called at the legation to ascertain if there was any foundation for these reports. I have not hesitated to declare that, in my opinion, they were spurious, and that there was nothing like an epidemic of trichinosis existing in the United States."

Again, at page 75 of the same report, other statements of the same character are grouped; and at pages 86 and 87 Mr. Morton telegraphs to Mr. Frelinghuysen that—

"It was stated in the chamber that Dr. Detmers, who was charged by American Government to investigate the trichinosis question, advised in his official report that all the hogs of the districts where trichinæ had made their appearance should be destroyed. Important to be fully informed."

To that telegram Mr. Frelinghuysen replied, under date December 29, 1883, in this way:

"Detmers stated incorrectly in 1878-'79, in report on swine plague, no trichinæ, that disease was very prevalent in the West."

That is the dispatch from our Secretary of State. He telegraphs to the American minister, of course deriving his information from the reports of the Agricultural Department, that trichinæ is very prevalent throughout the West. What has been the result?

Mr. PLUMB. I think if the Senator will read the report more carefully he will find that he refers to what is called the swine plague, and not trichinæ at all. The swine plague was very prevalent in the West some years ago.

Mr. COKE. I read the Secretary's language:

Detmers stated incorrectly in 1878-'79, in report on swine plague, no trichinæ, that disease was very prevalent in the West.

Mr. PLUMB. He was referring to the swine plague.

Mr. COKE. Well, it is swine plague, then; they call it trichinæ over in Europe.

Mr. PLUMB. They do not call it trichinæ. That was hog-cholera, and hog-cholera differs from it.

Mr. COKE. It is a diseased animal, and they do not draw the distinction. That information comes from the Agricultural Department. It is telegraphed to Europe, and there as a result Germany has excluded our swine product, and France has excluded nearly all of it. When we find that these reports about our cattle and our swine which are made by the Departments of our own Government are going abroad and fixing a stigma upon our cattle, or hogs, and other live-stock, we are gravely asked in this bill to appropriate $500,000 for the purpose of enlarging the influence of the department in giving circulation to these slanders against our products.

As an evidence of the manner in which things are done in that department, I desire to call attention to a report made to the Secretary of the Treasury by three gentlemen who were designated to act upon what is known as the Cattle Commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the date of the report?

Mr. COKE. December 21, 1883. They report at great length, and their conclusions are embraced in what I will read:

UNDER WHAT CONDITIONS CAN CERTIFICATES OF HEALTH BE FURNISHED WITH AMERICAN CATTLE EXPORTED.

The conditions prerequisite to a perfect quarantine of health in our cattle exported are:

For lung-plague.—That the governors of the States in which this infection exists shall put in force such measures as shall prevent the removal of any bovine animal out of the contaminated area, and above all, its introduction into any public stock-yard through which export cattle are drawn.

For Texas fever.—That the National Government shall prevent the shipment northward out of the area infected with Texas fever of all cattle whatsoever, excepting from the beginning of November to the beginning of March.

Under the action of such laws, rigidly administered, it would be safe to give a certificate of soundness, as regard these two plagues, to export cattle, and such a document should secure and maintain the confidence of all, and ought to bring a relaxation of the English restrictions if anything short of the absolute extinction of lung-plague in our midst will.

There are still other measures for which legislation is required, and as these are equally important with those above referred to, we beg to be allowed to submit them in brief.

What plagues? Pleuro-pneumonia and Texas fever. Here is a department of this Government branding the natural condition of one-third of all the cattle in the United States—branding the normal, natural condition of these cattle as a condition of disease like that which affects cattle stricken with pleuro-pneumonia and the putrid foot-and-mouth disease.

I have here a report from the Agricultural Department which gives the area infected with the Texas fever. It commences in Northern Virginia and extends southward to the Rio Grande. It embraces ten States and the Indian Territory; it embraces 15,000,000 of the 45,000,000 head of cattle in the United States; yet these officials of the Agricultural Department have not hesitated to publish to foreigners and to the world that these 15,000,000 head of cattle, worth at $30 a head $450,000,000, are sick of disease, and that such a plague as fits it to be classed with pleuro-pneumonia.

What are the facts with reference to Texas fever? Cattle in Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Arkansas, Texas, and the Indian Territory, though healthy themselves, are said to communicate this disease. They are the cattle which furnish the beef for the inhabitants of those States and the milk and butter they use. They are healthy. Their hair glistens in the sun. They are fat and sleek. A Texas steer can jump a ten-rail fence and put a quarter-horse to his metal to catch him on the prairie. He makes his own living on the range. Nobody feeds him; and in the spring when he is ready for market he is magnificent beef. Yet the Agricultural Department brands this stock as being afflicted with a plague which is classed with pleuro-pneumonia.

I have here the testimony of gentlemen engaged in the cattle business in Chicago to the effect that from 300,000 to 350,000 head of Texas cattle annually are marketed at Chicago. They say:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries concerning the sickness among cattle, commonly called "Texas fever," as to how it is regarded at the Union Stock-Yards, Chicago, Ill., we will state the following as facts coming under our personal observation:

The number of Texas cattle received at the stock-yards, Chicago, per year, will run from 300,000 to 350,000 head.

The sickness called "Texas fever" is not regarded with any special apprehension by the trade generally, as for a number of years past it appears to be diminishing.

The trade at the above-named yards in stock and feeding cattle and milch cows is very large, amounting to $500,000 to $1,000,000 per month. This trade is continuous, lasting the year round, there being no business day in which buyers are not operating, and during the warm months, when Texas cattle mostly arrive, buyers take store cattle and milch cows the same as if there were no Texas cattle in the yards. Cow dealers and store-cattle dealers take hay which has laid before Texas cattle to feed their own stock. These dealers often yard their own cattle in pens in which Texas cattle have stood to avail themselves of the feed left uneaten by the Texas cattle. In short, Texas cattle have worked themselves out from their former reputation as being highly dangerous to bring in contact with our native cattle. Authenticated cases of "Texas fever" of late years are scarce, and the percentage of mortality arising therefrom is so small compared with the aggregate transactions that dealers pay but little attention thereto.

Very respectfully,

B. F. HARRISON.
F. D. BARTLETT.

A large trade is done in Texas cattle at Kansas City, a large trade at Saint Louis, a large trade in New York and Philadelphia. I do not know how many are marketed in those places, but in the city of Chicago from 300,000 to 350,000 head are marketed annually, and finer beef is not to be had on this continent. Yet our own Agricultural Department has stigmatized it in a way that if possible it would have been driven from our home markets, and it has been seriously depreciated in foreign markets.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator, if it is not interrupting him too much, if he is undertaking to deny that Texas cattle carried to the North during the summer season will communicate a fatal disease to the native cattle of that part of the country?

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will just wait a moment I will get to that. I say that Texas cattle and cattle from this infected district, as it is called by the Agricultural Department, are healthy cattle; that they furnish healthy food, healthy milk and butter, the food upon which the people in all those States subsist. I presume if one of those gentlemen could see a drove of our Texas steers ready for market and see the activity necessary in the drivers and their horses to keep them on the trail they would come to the conclusion that they were not very sick after all.

But this is not the worst of it. What is the recommendation here? It is recommended "that the National Government shall prevent the shipment northward out of the area infected with Texas fever of all cattle whatsoever, excepting from the beginning of November to the beginning of March."

Mr. MCPHERSON. What do you read from?

Mr. COKE. I read from the report of the Cattle Commission, made by James Law, E. F. Thayer, and J. H. Sanders. Without meaning any disrespect to these gentlemen, I say that this recommendation is simply an outrage. When are our cattle fit for market? It is only from about the last of April until about the 1st of November. They feed and fatten on the natural grasses of the prairies and plains. All through the South the cattle fatten upon what we call the range. It is only in the spring and summer that they are fit for market, and yet that very period is the time these gentlemen have selected when they shall not be driven to market. If this bureau of animal industry is to be managed by gentlemen with no more regard for rights of the people whom I represent than this report would indicate, I would advise my constituents, if the bill passes with the plenary powers they ask for, to get rid of their cattle, because they would be worthless to them hereafter.

The Commissioner of Agriculture has reported the area infected with Texas fever, and here is the report of his veterinary surgeon to the Treasury Department, in which he advises that cattle in the area affected by Texas fever shall not be permitted to go out of that country between March and November, the only time when they are fit for market. Our cattle have to make their own living in the South. They are not fed; they grow upon the ranges, and in the winter season, the time the market is left open to them, it is about all they can do to make a living on the range. It is not until spring, or, as we say out West, when "grass rises," that the cattle commence to pick up, and along about April or May to become fat. But these gentlemen say they must be quarantined from the 1st of March.

I say that if you give the powers asked for in this bill upon the recommendation of the veterinary surgeons of the Agriculture Department and the Cattle Commission, our cattle, from Virginia to the Rio Grande, at the only season of the year when they are fat enough for market, will be quarantined. As was remarked by a Senator now near me, the bill is a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus and a declaration of martial law as to all cattle from Virginia southward to the Rio Grande.

I will now speak of what the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] asked me a while ago. It is said of Texas cattle or cattle from Virginia, North Carolina, or any of the States embraced within the infected area, driven north into a different climate, if they graze on a field, and afterward the Northern or native cattle follow them and graze on the same field, the Northern cattle take the disease and die. I presume that is true; but there is this about it: you can put the Texas cattle in the same car with Northern cattle and transport them anywhere and the Northern cattle do not take the disease. No sort of contact produces it. It can be communicated and is communicated only by Northern cattle pasturing after the Texas cattle. You can put them in the same car and carry them together; you may feed them in the same lot on dry food, as is done at Chicago every day, as I have certificates here showing, and no disease ensues. When the Northern cattle go behind Texas cattle grazing on the same range, if they are taken sick you may take the sick Northern cow and carry her among a thousand other Northern cows and she does not communicate any disease. The disease comes only from grazing after the Texas cattle by the native cattle of the North.

This thing is well understood. I am told by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] that there is a law in North Carolina forbidding the driving of cattle from the lower country up into the mountains at certain seasons of the year. The people understand this thing in all these States. They understand it thoroughly in Texas. Northward of us lie Missouri, Kansas, and Colorado. Those States have stringent quarantine laws, which our people respect, and are bound to respect, because they have shotguns behind them. They know how to enforce their laws there. The people on the Atlantic seaboard understand this disease. This report says it has existed in North Carolina one hundred years. The only place from which there would be any danger is Texas. Texas is hemmed in by the most rigid State quarantines. They can not get out of Texas to the detriment of other stock. There is a trail laid out for them through the Indian Territory upon which no other cattle go.

Texas or splenetic fever is called a disease. It is not a disease. No man has ever been able to explain it. When the people understand exactly how to handle cattle so as to avoid any evil consequences of this so-called disease, where I ask is the necessity of our having the Agricultural Department publishing to Europe and to the rest of the world that one-third of the cattle in the United States, 15,000,000 head, worth $450,000,000, the chief staple of food of all the inhabitants of the country where they are found, are affected with a deadly plague? Why is it that the Agricultural Department is so persistent in crying aloud the horrors of a dreadful cattle-plague when none exists, thereby destroying the marketable value abroad of our cattle? Why is it that they make these advertisements? There is but one reason for it. Twice has this bill been kicked without ceremony out of the Senate, and it comes here again. That department is determined to aggrandize itself; that department is determined to take charge of all the stock in this country. It is determined to lay its hand not only on the cattle, but the bill embraces the horses, the sheep, the hogs, the goats, and the next step will be to take charge of the fowls also.

I now ask the attention of Senators to some information that I will give them. Let me read:

UNION STOCK-YARDS, Chicago, Ill., April 14, 1884.

TO EMORY A. STORRS, Riggs House:

There never has been any sickness among cattle here that any one pretended to call contagious pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease.

E. TITUS WILLIAMS,
Superintendent Union Stock-Yards.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me right in this connection to emphasize the statement made by Mr. Williams? It is well known that Chicago is the great central point; that cattle from every State and Territory in the Union seek a market there. If disease existed anywhere it would be absolutely certain to show itself in those stock-yards after the cattle had been shipped over long routes, consuming days in transportation to reach the city of Chicago. If disease existed anywhere it would be developed there, by reason of the perils and privations of the trip. The stock are deprived often largely of food and water for a long time. I only wished to emphasize the statement made by Mr. Williams.

Mr. COKE. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Again:

JERSEY CITY, N. J., April 15, 1884.

Hon. EMORY A. STORRS, Washington, D. C.:

Our receipts of cattle at the yard in the year 1883 were 423,800 head. We have never had any pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, or any other contagious disease at these yards.

EAST LIBERTY, PA., April 15, 1884.

To E. A. STORRS:

We, the undersigned, certify that we have been in the cattle business at these yards for the last ten years; have never had any stock affected with pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, or any other contagious disease. The receipts at this yard of stock and fat cattle are about 400,000 head per year.

EMORY A. STORRS:

We received and yarded 250,000 cattle last year, and had not a single case of pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease.

J. B. DUTCHER,
President Union Stock-Yard and Market Company.

Now I wish to read an affidavit with reference to the Texas fever. I have the original here on my table:

Robert Strahorn, H. H. Conover, Lewis R. Hastings, and Reuben P. Conger, being first duly sworn, upon their oaths state:

That they are now engaged in buying and selling cattle at the Union Stock-Yards of Chicago, and have been so engaged for at least twenty years past; that the annual receipts of Texas cattle at said stock-yards amount to from 300,000 to 350,000 head, and that the disease known as "Texas fever" is not now regarded at said stock-yards with any apprehension, and has not been so regarded for years, and that any fears that may have been entertained in the past at said stock-yards on that score have been dispelled by reason of almost total immunity from said disease at that point.

That the average number of cattle received and sold at the said stock-yards weekly is about 36,000 head, and that sellers, buyers, and owners of the same—in short, every one handling cattle there—have no hesitation in yarding calves, milch cows, stockers, feeders, fat cattle, or any other cattle in the pens that have just been occupied by Texas cattle, and allowing them to drink water from the same troughs and to eat the hay left by the Texas cattle; and that, in short, the authentic cases of "Texas fever" at said stock-yards have been so small in comparison with the aggregate transactions in Texas cattle that the disease has come to be regarded there as an exploded theory.

R. STRAHORN.
H. H. CONOVER.
L. R. HASTINGS.
R. P. CONGER.

Texas fever, a great plague, so reported by the veterinary surgeon of the Agricultural Department, as existing in cattle which furnish healthy food for one-third or one-fourth of the people of the United States, occupying about one-third of the area, and numbering one-third of all the cattle of the United States, 350,000 head of them marketed annually in one single city, a plague which as I have shown exists only in the imagination of certain officials in this city, it is one of the principal objects of this bill to provide against.

You have heard about the pleuro-pneumonia. Where is it? Here is one of Dr. Salmon's late reports, veterinary surgeon for the Agricultural Department. He says, speaking of pleuro-pneumonia:

Glancing over the territory which I have stated to be infected—and it must be confessed that it is not extensive—a single farm, with perhaps five animals, in Connecticut, about four counties in New York, as many in New Jersey, two or three counties in Maryland, and possibly a few stables in Delaware and Virginia.

Again:

Now, while it is true that pleuro-pneumonia has existed in the East for forty years without having been carried to the West, it must be admitted, from what has occurred so many times in Pennsylvania and Connecticut, that there has been danger of this, and that this danger is increasing with the larger number of cattle now being shipped in that direction.

For forty years it has existed in this country and no case has ever gone west of the mountains. So the very gentlemen who recommend this bill say the disease exists only in one or two places in Connecticut, two or three places in New York, as many in New Jersey, and two or three counties in Maryland.

Mr. McPHERSON. When it is found to exist, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if there is any evidence to the contrary showing that it is not immediately stamped out?

Mr. COKE. Certainly. I was going to state that Dr. Salmon says that in the States where this report locates it (possibly except Virginia; I think I will not have to except Maryland; but it exists only in two or three stables in Virginia) each one of the States has a rigid provision on its statute-books providing for stamping out the disease wherever it manifests itself. That is all there is of pleuro-pneumonia. Not one case of it has ever been carried from this country to Europe, as the consular reports say.

Mr. McPHERSON. It could not exist in New Jersey for an hour under our laws.

Mr. COKE. The Senator from New Jersey says it could not exist in New Jersey for an hour, where they have a provision for buying up diseased cattle and slaughtering them at once. Here is the great bugaboo. There have been perhaps a dozen cases of so-called pleuro-pneumonia, which has been in the country according to these gentlemen for forty years, and no case has ever gone west of the Alleghany Mountains. Why all this cry about pleuro-pneumonia when there is none of it? Would it not have appeared in Chicago, where their cattle transactions amount to $200,000,000 a year? Would it not have appeared in the stock-yards in New York, at Philadelphia, at Jersey City? Yet I have read you certificates stating that no single case has ever appeared at either one of those localities. Would it not have appeared at Saint Louis or at Kansas City? Yet who has ever heard of a case suspected of being west of the Alleghany Mountains? The only basis for this bill is sensational reports gotten up by gentlemen belonging to the Agricultural Department for the purpose of building up the importance of that department and getting a large expenditure of public money, the creation of fat places, and the exercise of more power.

Who are so much interested in sound cattle, in a steady, reliable market, in the absence of panics, in the absence of anything to unsettle values in the market as the gentlemen of the stock-yards of Chicago, Jersey City, New York, Philadelphia, and other points from which I have read certificates? It must be remembered that these gentlemen are also producers of cattle. They have their ranches all over the West. They have many of them in my State; they have them all through the stock-raising country. Yet you find these people, representing the vast interest in stock in this country, rising up as one man and protesting against the passage of this bill. Why is this? This thing will affect their pockets. If there was any virtue in it it would save them money; but they are practical men, they are wise men in their business, and they believe that to place this power in the hands of the Agricultural Department would be ruinous to them.

Are they wrong, Mr. President? When you find the veterinary surgeons gravely recommending a quarantine upon 15,000,000 head of cattle, keeping them out of market at the only time when they are fit for market, are these men to be blamed for being unwilling to intrust the great stock interests of this country to a department which must depend upon such advisers?

The whole basis, the whole foundation upon which this bill rests, when it comes to be inspected and analyzed, is found to be absolutely worthless. It is based upon a false clamor, upon sensational reports, upon grossly exaggerated statements, upon imaginary facts, and upon a selfish desire for personal advancement, comfortable salaries, and easy places.

So much for the bill generally. I desire at this time to call attention particularly to one or two of its provisions. I read from the first section:

And the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose—

That is, to make the investigation into the health of cattle and all sorts of stock—not to exceed twenty persons at any one time.

"Not to exceed twenty persons at any one time." They are to investigate the cattle of 50,000,000 people, scattered over a continent. Who are they? They are to be appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, a very honorable gentleman, but who is as liable to be mistaken as anybody else in men. See the immense power. When they report to him he can not go out and examine; he must act upon their recommendation and advice. What do they go out for? They go out to hunt disease. They will find it. Their bread and meat, their office, will depend on finding disease in American cattle, American hogs, American horses, and in all sorts of American stock, because the more disease they will find the more necessity there will seem to be for their services. It is a premium offered for defamation and slander upon the great live-stock interests of the United States.

With such a bureau as this organized, who can foresee the result? Twenty men scouring the country, looking for a sick steer, a sick hog, or a sick horse, of course they will find them. They will report them with a flourish of trumpets, and the next electric wave will waft it under the ocean to Europe, and our stock, our cattle, and our hogs will take another tumble, and we will have other restrictions placed upon them. That will be the result. No other result could happen. Section 2 of the bill provides:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act.

Here are two agents to have charge of the great interest of stock transportation through the United States. Besides, they have to prescribe the methods of treating sick animals and how to extirpate infectious diseases. They must also be experienced stock-raisers and commercial men besides. Did any two gentlemen ever have more diversified labors placed upon them before? If you can find a man who is a good cow-doctor, a good horse-doctor, a first-rate broker, and a good railroad man, an expert commercial man, as well as a practical stock-raiser, it does seem that $10 per day (which is the amount fixed in the bill) will be very poor pay. He certainly would be able to earn more than $10 a day; yet these vast interests are to be placed in the hands of two men who can be hired at this price to be chaffered with and beset with competing bids by railroad companies, cattle companies, and stock-brokers, each anxious and willing to pay for special privileges and advantages. You can not safely intrust such an interest to any two living men who can be hired at $10 a day, or $20 a day, or $50 a day.

Remember, these men are to investigate and report. The Commissioner of Agriculture can not examine for himself; he must rely upon these two men; and when they come with their report he must adopt it or not act upon any sufficient information. The cattle alone of the United States in 1880 numbered thirty-nine millions and some hundred thousand head. I suppose they now number 45,000,000 head. Twenty-five dollars a head would bring a thousand and two hundred and fifty million dollars. Yet that does not include the horses, the hogs, the sheep, the goats, and other stock which are embraced in the bill. If I had to estimate the value of the cattle interest in the United States I would say it was a billion five hundred million dollars' worth at least. Yet the annual product of that great interest is to be subjected in its marketing, in its transportation, in the methods of sanitary treatment, upon which so much of its value depends, to the discretion of two individuals and twenty other agents specially commissioned to hunt out diseases among stock. They are to have the great railroad companies bidding at them, they are to have great stock companies bidding at them, they are to have temptations placed before them such as no men have ever had in the history of this country.

I ask Senators if it is right, if it is fair, to reach out and lay the hand of the Government upon this vast property and subject it to such conditions? It is unrepublican; it is undemocratic; it is not in accord with our methods. Let our people alone. They can attend to their own business. The States are ready to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia wherever it may manifest itself. They are stamping out the foot-and-mouth disease wherever it exists. They are quarantining against Texas fever, and have rendered it perfectly innocuous. Where, then, is the necessity for a bill which embraces the entire live-stock interest of this country and hands it over to the guardianship of the Commissioner of Agriculture, who must depend upon the advice of twenty cheap agents and two cheap supervisors, liable to be bought out and influenced to a betrayal of the interests of the people? Why should the thing be done? If the Cattle Commission and veterinary surgeons will only stop libeling and defaming the cattle of the United States we will hear no more of restrictions in Europe upon their importation. Our hog products and the importations of our cattle in foreign countries have suffered from restrictions, and commenced to suffer from the time that the unholy ambition of the Agricultural Department was directed toward this object, from the time that the reports of our Government through that department fixed a stigma upon the health of our cattle and other stock.

This bill, if passed, will give no relief, but will aggravate all the evils we now suffer from. It will involve a vast and annually increasing expenditure of money. It will multiply officials and harass the people with impertinent surveillance in their domestic affairs.

Why is it that in Canada they get full prices, when with as good stock we have to submit to a discount of from $12 to $15 a head, as was stated by the Senator from Kansas? It is because in Canada they have not a lot of agents who are ambitious to increase their power and magnify their salaries and have a good thing made out of a bureau of animal industry.

Mr. President, the bureau of animal industry of these United States is among all the people of this great country. Their intelligence prompted by their self-interest is the watchful guardian of that bureau. It costs the Government nothing. It may cost the State something, but they pay it and attend well to their own business.

I say to you and I say to the Senate that in my judgment it would be a great misfortune to pass such a bill as this. We are doing too much of this sort of thing; we are taking hold too much of the people's business. We are not submitting enough to that intelligence which we know exists among the people, and which we believe is the only guarantee for the excellence and stability of our Government.

Our Government is not a paternal one; it is a Government of granted, delegated, and enumerated powers, and proceeds upon the theory that the people know how to attend to their own business without the aid of the Commissioner of Agriculture or anybody else when it comes to raising and taking care of cattle, hogs, horses, sheep, &c. I say let the people alone. This bill was driven from the Senate twice before, each time after only about an hour's debate, and it ought to go out of the Senate again. There is no virtue in it now more than there was then. We had up a scare here about the foot-and-mouth disease in Kansas, pronounced, when it first broke out, by one of the veterinary surgeons of the Department in a dispatch to be the genuine article, the European foot-and-mouth disease—at least he was so reported in the papers, and I read the dispatch. We had that scare, and it turns out to be baseless and groundless.

Mr. GEORGE. Does it not exist in Kansas?

Mr. COKE. The conclusion there is that there is none in that State and never has been any there. Upon the spur of that panic we passed through Congress a bill appropriating $50,000 to be sent to Kansas to suppress the disease. If it had not been for that, manipulated as it was artfully for the purpose of advancing legislation of this character, this bill would not stand in the Senate one hour any more than it did when it was before the Senate twice heretofore.

There is no pleuro-pneumonia in this country. The records show it. The certificates from the stock-yards at Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, and all the points from which I have read certificates state the fact. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] shakes his head. They state the fact to be true that no pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease or any other contagious disease has been in those stock-yards for twenty years. Cattle from all over this country, from everywhere, go into those yards, and if the disease was anywhere in the country those would be the places to find it. So there is no cause for this bill; there is no ground for it; there is no reason for it. You spend the people's money; you annoy and harass the people in the management of their own business unnecessarily by passing it.

If the bill is modified into a bill providing for thorough quarantining to prevent infection from landing in this country I am willing to vote for it. I am willing to vote for another modification that shall so establish quarantine posts for exported meats and live-stock that nothing diseased can go out of the country. I am willing to go as far as any man ought to go to keep out foreign disease, and if any should get in here to keep it from being sent abroad again, to stamp it out at our quarantine stations on the coast. I am willing to do that, but I am not willing to appoint two supervisors and twenty detectives to go smelling around every man's stable and cow-lot and pig-sty to see if he can not find something to report to the Agricultural Department so that a charge of disease may be made out of it.

I am not willing to do that. The Commissioner of Agriculture needs no such assistance. The people are attending to this thing themselves; the profits of their business depend on giving it good attention, and they do not want any assistance from the Agricultural Department. The States are doing their whole duty; and the theory upon which gentlemen invade States for the purpose of taking hold of their police powers is that they are not doing their duty. That is the only theory on which they go into the States. It is not true in this case. The States are doing their whole duty. Missouri and Kansas and Colorado are taking care of Texas fever, and the States where pleuro-pneumonia and foot-and-mouth disease are alleged to exist are destroying it as fast as it appears.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I can add nothing to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. He has exhausted the whole subject. If anything more could be said, the reason and argument may be found in a document which I notice upon my table this morning, and which is also on the table of every Senator: "The animal industry bill; argument for the substitute and additional documents, by Emory A. Storrs, of Chicago," which is an intelligent and complete answer to every argument made by the friends of the measure. I commend it to Senators, and regret very much that it has not been earlier placed on our tables in order that it might be fully digested. I find on page 42 of that document what purports to be an editorial from the New York Tribune of March 18, which I ask to have the Secretary read, as it seems to me to state in a more concise manner than I possibly can the whole reasons for which this legislation is sought.

The Secretary read as follows:

FIFTH.

[Editorial from the New York Daily Tribune, March 18, 1884.]

WHAT TO DO ABOUT ANIMAL DISEASE.

There has not been before in many years such general health among American cattle and hogs as there is now. The late swine commissioners—one of whom visited twenty-six States—found practically no disease. There is, and probably always will be, occasional trichinæ, a very small percentage, but the "experts" know little or nothing of its cause; it affects our pork perhaps no more than that of other countries, and the one and easy safety is in thorough cooking. The "cholera," which has been made excuse for selfish sensationalism so costly to producers, had "disappeared" last fall, according to official admission. But how about pleuro-pneumonia? Not an item of proof has been brought against the many competent witnesses who testify that there is very little of that.

Whence, then, all this noisy affirmation? It emanates from a few persons already in Government employ, and naturally anxious to enlarge and perpetuate their easy places. Every slight local sickness is magnified and telegraphed over the whole land, as was the case the other day in Columbia County, New York. The alarmists are thoroughly organized; they have been working toward this one end half a dozen years, and it is proverbial that plea is much more active than protest. But we are not saying—and never have said—that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in the Atlantic States. It would be strange if there were not, with our frequent cattle importations from the infected fields of Europe. Let what there may be be "stamped out," but do it in a sensible, business-like way.

If the few States claimed to be infected are not deemed capable of dealing with the disease, as in Massachusetts and elsewhere, then let the Government put the whole matter into the hands of some one practical, honest, business man, with authority to quarantine, to buy, to kill, and bury or burn, calling to his aid all necessary assistants and co-operation; and then let him present the bill, with vouchers for every item of expense. But to organize for this simple work the proposed new "bureau of animal industry," and that, too, in connection with the not highly esteemed "Agricultural Department" at Washington, and equip it with a quarter of a million dollars and twenty men appointed by political intrigue, is to repeat on a mammoth scale the "hog-cholera" disgrace and the "grasshopper" folly of past years.

So of "foot-and-mouth disease," of which we have lately heard in Maine and Kansas. That, too, if it is here at all, was also imported. Get rid of it at once in the same simple way above suggested; and, our coasts once clear of these much-talked-of sources of danger, let us see that we stop bringing any more of either infection across the Atlantic, since quarantine restrictions seem to prove ineffectual. For why should the whole vast cattle interests of America be put in jeopardy for the profit of the few who ship cattle here for speculative purpose? We have a good plant of all the leading thorough breeds of Europe; let us make the best of them, and likewise of our own hardy, healthy natives, which contain elements capable of unsurpassed development.

But, after all, it is one comfort to reflect that this costly sensationalism which has characterized the agitation of "contagion" will not be wholly without compensating results if it serve indirectly to draw attention to the important truth that health in domestic animals, as in human creatures, can only result from wholesome food, pure air, comfortable quarters, and general provision for maintenance of strength. Western hogs can not keep well nested in mud and cold, or in sties reeking with filth, and eating frozen, moldy corn; nor Eastern cows in crowded, unventilated stables, with fermenting brewers' grains, glucose, meal, and half-decayed ensilage as insufficient feed. When all stock-keepers humanely regard the comfort of their animals there will not be a hook left for hungry alarmists to lay hold upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am sorry that my friend from Texas [Mr. COKE], in the ardor of his feelings, has been carried so far in the denunciation of the motives of the men who are asking the passage of this bill through Congress. I am sure he intended no personal disrespect to me.

Mr. COKE. Certainly not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say I am sure of that, nor to the great body of stock-raisers in this country; and I can say to him after that storm of denunciation, that I am still standing out in the open air, and not at all disturbed by this Texas norther.

I have given a great deal of thought and investigation to this subject, representing, as I do, a constituency deeply interested in stock-raising, and being a stock-raiser myself. I wish the Senate all understood this question as well as I do. I wish they had examined it as thoroughly as the papers before us might have enabled them to do. Understanding it as I do, I am deeply impressed with the importance of something being done by Congress in the premises, not only for the purpose of protecting the health of our own domestic herds, but for the further purpose of placing our foreign meat trade upon a surer and better basis. Already four of the principal governments of Europe have prohibited absolutely the importation of our hog product into their ports; and England, the largest consumer and best customer for our breadstuffs and meats, has imposed restrictions on our live-cattle trade that have well-nigh destroyed that business, and all this for what? Because we have no inspection or sanitary laws in this country that will give our foreign customers a reasonable assurance that the live animals and dead meats we send them are healthy and wholesome for food.

In view of the further fact that we are in the very near future to lose our supremacy in the grain markets of Europe, it behooves us well to look to the meat trade. In consequence of abundant crops in this country and failures in Europe for three or four years we have had the command of the British grain market, immensely to the profit of our farmers, but we are losing that, and to-day wheat is 10 cents cheaper in Liverpool than in the city of New York. All this time that our abundant harvests have enabled us to make these enormous shipments abroad our old rivals have been strengthening their competitive powers by railroads and by the erection of grain elevators on the Baltic and Black Seas, until they are ready now to drive us out of the European market; and Great Britain, not at all discouraged by her unsuccessful efforts to produce cotton in Egypt and India, has turned her attention to the development of the wheat-growing interest in her Asiatic colonial possessions, and we have it upon the best authority that within the last twelve months India alone has sent to the markets of Great Britain 40,000,000 bushels of as good wheat as is produced on the face of the earth, and in twelve months more the expectation of Great Britain is that she will receive her whole supply from her own colonial possessions; and where shall we then be if we lose our meat and grain markets both? It behooves the Congress of the United States to be looking well to our traffic in meat, that our farmers may have the means of concentrating their grain into flesh, which is more profitable even now than to ship the grain, for one bushel of wheat will make twelve pounds of pork.

I do not propose to discuss the constitutional power of Congress, notwithstanding the Senator from Texas denounces this measure as unconstitutional in all its provisions. But he gives us no argument to sustain his declaration, and his vehement denunciations fail to carry conviction with them. He says that this bill is placing the whole cattle interest of the South Atlantic and Gulf States, including Texas, in the hands of an agricultural commission. That is a wide mistake. The bill does not propose to place all the cattle anywhere in the hands of a commission. If they are all diseased there is not a commission on earth that could manage them, and all they can do is to recommend that the Texas cattle be kept at home until they can be sent abroad with safety; and if they are all healthy, as the Senator seems to think, this commission will have no control over them. We have no occasion here to draw our authority from the general-welfare clause, because there is an express provision in the Constitution giving Congress absolute control over commerce with foreign nations and between the several States, which covers completely the entire question.

It is amazing to me that Senators will persist in so misunderstanding this bill and misrepresenting its provisions from misunderstanding them. They say that it interferes with the reserved powers of the States and with the rights of private property. Now, sir, this is a mistake. This bill does not undertake to interfere with the local authorities in the slightest particular. It proposes to act in harmony with them in devising the best method of preventing the spread of infectious diseases among our domestic animals and of arresting and extinguishing them where they are found.

The amendment reported from the committee of the Senate provides that when this commission shall have promulgated rules and regulations to be adopted by them for the benefit and guidance of all drovers and public carriers engaged in the transportation of live-stock, they shall present the same rules to the several States wherein the diseases complained of may be found to exist; and if those States will accept and adopt those rules or suggest others that will be equally efficacious, the commission raised under the auspices of the Department of Agriculture shall act in harmony and concert with them and actually pay for the cattle they may necessarily destroy for the public good.

But if a State does not and will not take any steps to arrest the spread of these diseases from its own borders into other States, then the President upon proper information is authorized by his proclamation to put that State in quarantine and forbid the transportation of its cattle into other States. Is there anything wrong in that? Is there anything violative of the reserved rights of the States or of the liberties or property rights of the people? Shall a State be permitted to make herself a hot-bed of pestilence, and send a constant stream of disease and death into her sister States to destroy the property of the people? And will great lawyers tell us that there is no remedy? There is a remedy, sir, in the Constitution, and Congress has the power to apply that remedy. There can be no doubt of that.

Mr. President, it is something amusing to me to see how these cattle bills stampede the Texas herds as if you had shaken a red flag in their faces; the cattle all run away; but the gallant Senator throws himself in the breach and covers their retreat. Oh, he says, you may pass what bills you please against pleuro-pneumonia and foot-and-mouth diseases, but you must let my Texas cattle alone; you must not touch them. I should like to know if these Texas bulls belong to a royal race; if they are sacred like the cattle of the Brahmins of India, that they shall be given the freedom of a whole continent, with full liberty to roam where they please and gore every man's ox with impunity. I know all about these Texas cattle. A Texas steer is a great, tall, long, thin, slab-sided brute, with wide-extended horns, sometimes seven or eight feet from tip to tip. He is said to have come from the bulls whose exploits delighted the old hidalgos of Spain; but notwithstanding his high historic descent, my judgment is that he is entitled to no more privileges in this democratic country of ours than common cattle.

The Senator denies that there is any disease among his cattle in Texas, but he admits that at certain seasons of the year they are capable of communicating a disease which kills all other cattle that graze with them on the same pastures. That admits the whole question. I do not want a stronger argument for my side.

But the Senator says the people down his way have got to understand this thing and they are regulating it themselves. Ah, Mr. President, we Western stock-raisers are not willing to trust to the honor of the cattle-trader and the cowboy for the security of our herds. We do not want to rely on the shotgun to defend them any longer. We want a law passed by the Government of a common country that shall protect these herds and hold those Texas cattle back within her borders until a certain season of the year when the observations of scientific men and the experiments that have been made tell us that they can be carried North with impunity. And why shall it not be done? The State of Missouri not long ago passed a law prohibiting the introduction into that State of Texas cattle except during a certain season of the year. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that law unconstitutional, upon the ground that Congress had the exclusive right to control commerce between the States of this Union. Texas herself has no law to forbid it. The Supreme Court has decided that the adjoining States can not prohibit it, and great lawyers here tell us that the National Government can not, and therefore this great cattle interest of the country hangs up between the devil and high water and there is no help for it, no security for it.

The Senator says it is nobody but the officers of the Government and people who want places who advocate the passage of this bill. Let me tell him it is the whole stock-raising people of the country. All the agricultural associations, stock journals, and stock-raisers of the West and Northwest have memorialized Congress, and so have many of the State Legislatures, asking some remedy against the spread of these destructive animal diseases, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague among cattle.

Who is opposing it? There is one—Emory Storrs, a distinguished lawyer from the city of Chicago, I understand has been here lobbying against the stock-raisers of his own country. Who send him here? A lot of cattle salesmen in the city of Chicago. I know a great many of them myself. Not one of them is a cattle-raiser in the sense we ordinarily understand it out West. They are cattle-men who sell cattle on commission, and it is their interest to have the largest number possible in their yards, sick or well. It is said that two of those men are interested in the Eastern calf trade, buying calves and selling them in Chicago.

I want to read to the Senate a very short paragraph from the Breeders' Gazette, the first stock paper in America, in reply to the efforts being made by these commission men to defeat this bill, and I should further state that some of them, as I am informed, are engaged in the dead-meat trade with Europe, in slaughtering beeves and shipping them in ice to Liverpool, and therefore are opposed to the live-cattle trade. Here is what this Gazette says:

It is an important and significant fact that no other interests save those represented by Mr. Storrs have opposed the passage of this bill, and as he has in the opening of his argument named these parties, I beg leave to direct the attention of the members of the Senate to the fact that none of them are in any sense farmers or cattle-raisers.

Colonel Sanders, editor of the Gazette, knows every one of them.

If any of them are interested at all in the business of breeding and raising cattle, it is only incidental, and has but little bearing on their views upon questions that affect their main business as brokers and shippers, who handle cattle on a commission at so much per head.

These are the cattle-men of the West who oppose this bill. What do you say to the great meeting held at Cheyenne two or three days ago? Five hundred of the greatest stock-raisers in that country assembled there and sent a petition here.

Further on the Gazette says:

On the other hand, it may also be well to bear in mind that the passage of some such measure as that now pending in the Senate has been urgently petitioned for by every agricultural society of any prominence in the great cattle-raising regions, and by nearly every representative body of cattle-raisers in the United States. This of itself is a significant fact, and ought to lead Senators to ponder well before they oppose the passage of this bill.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him if Dr. Sanders is on the Cattle Commission?

Mr. WILLIAMS. He is a member of the Cattle Commission, and forty times as good authority as the men who oppose it, because he was selected for his practical knowledge of the business.

Mr. COKE. He joined in the report to the Secretary of the Treasury which I mentioned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He did. He is a trusted officer of the Government, in whose judgment and opinion we have confidence, and not one of these outside fellows. I know more about this matter than any one of these men. I am a stock-raiser and familiar with the whole business and with many of the men who are interested in this great industry in the West. I know that this bill is desired by nineteen-twentieths of all the farmers and stock-raisers throughout the entire West.

Gentlemen say that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in this country. My God! If the Senator will read these voluminous reports, signed by the Treasury Cattle Commission, the head of which was Dr. Law, of Cornell University, they will be satisfied that the disease exists to-day in New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and in the District of Columbia. I know it is here, for I have seen it myself right in this city this winter.

Mr. COKE. I read from Dr. Salmon's report the places where it exists.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did you read Dr. Law's report? Did you read the Cattle Commission report?

Mr. COKE. Only Dr. Salmon's report. He gave the places.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is the report signed by Dr. Law and the two associated with him. There is no doubt about it. The Senator from New Jersey has doubts, but I do not think he knows much about it, for he had the candor a few years ago when the subject was under discussion to say he had never seen a case and did not know what it was, and I am satisfied of it from what he said to-day. Here is a report from his own commissioner of the State of New Jersey, in which he states the number of counties in which he found it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will say that while the State which I have the honor in part to represent here is charged in these reports with being one of the infected, I have never yet been able to discover a case of pleuro-pneumonia in the State after diligent search. It is this of which I complain, that these gentlemen who desire $500,000 to go searching with a lantern and search-warrant all over this country are just as ignorant of that fact as the Senator from New Jersey. It may be in other States, but I have no knowledge of it. In short, I think I have knowledge that it does not exist in my State, notwithstanding the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a question of opinion, and while I may be perfectly willing to trust Dr. MCPHERSON, from New Jersey, with questions of law, finance, and naval affairs, I am not disposed to trust him with cattle diseases. I stated distinctly that men selected for their eminence in the very profession to which we have called them state that the disease exists. There is no doubt about that.

The Senator from Texas says that his cattle have no disease, and he wants to except them from the operation of the bill. What we want to do is not only to eradicate this disease from our own herds but to regain our lost meat market abroad. Complaints have come to this country from the British authorities at London and Liverpool that Texas cattle were being shipped there. What we want is that our cattle may be allowed not only to enter the ports of England but when they get there be taken into the interior of the country, where they may recover from the wounds, bruises, and fever incident to a long voyage in this country of one or two thousand miles sometimes and the sea voyage besides. But as it is they are compelled to be slaughtered in the abattoirs immediately after arrival. This has resulted in a loss to our cattle-men of fifteen to twenty dollars per head upon animals thus sent abroad.

If you allow Texas cattle to go there they will never remove their restrictions. I think, Mr. President, all the denunciation of the Departments and the officers and the veterinary surgeons and the Agricultural Commissioner and everybody connected with this bill was entirely gratuitous on the part of the Senator from Texas, and it is so unlike him, that I regretted exceedingly that in the heat of debate he was led into that style of denunciation, for he is extremely amiable ordinarily.

The Senator from Texas says that the disease existed a great while in portions of the States along the Atlantic seaboard, and never yet got beyond the Alleghany Mountains. What is the reason? The reason is to be found in the fact that the cattle trade has all been from the West to the East, and the price of cattle has always been higher in the East than the West. I never saw a New Jersey animal in the State of Kentucky in my life. I never saw a New York cow or young steer in Kentucky; but I have seen thousands of Kentucky cattle in the New York markets. But with the enormous growth of cities in the East, and great demand for milk and butter, the dairy interest has become very important, and there has been a demand in the West for the young stock of the East, and they are now gathered up and shipped by the thousand West. It is said on good authority that last year they received forty or fifty thousand dairy calves shipped to Chicago alone, to be distributed over the grazing lands of the West. This is where the danger lies to which we are constantly exposed.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether I am to understand him to admit the position stated by the Senator from Texas that no case of pleuro-pneumonia has ever occurred west of the Alleghany Mountains.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do; and I want to keep it from going there. That is exactly what we are after. The difference between me and him and the Senator from New Jersey and those of us out West who support the bill is just this; that we have not the disease among us and do not want it, and are willing to be taxed to secure this end; but these men who have the disease among them do not want to keep it back. There is not a case of it in Kentucky and never has been, but I am fearful it will come every day.

We know that pleuro-pneumonia is a deadly disease; we know that it is incurable; we know that it is ineradicable practically. For that reason we want to keep it out. It is now confined within five or six States or portions of those States in a belt of land about three hundred miles long and one hundred and fifty wide, and we want to exterminate it there before it spreads farther. The States have tried for twenty or thirty years, and have shown themselves powerless to eradicate it, and we are now invoking the strong arm of the Central Government to throttle and stamp it out wherever it can be found, as the only means of preventing its spread and the only means of enabling us to have healthy cattle shipped abroad. That is why we are so anxious about this thing.

We know in Kentucky that our short-horned cattle will be of less value to us if this disease once gets where our blooded bulls are wanted to improve the native stock; and that it must go there unless prevented is absolutely certain. Its march is slow but constant, and it may break out any day. The great cattle interests of the country demand that Congress shall do something.

This bill in my judgment is one of the most important that has been before Congress since I have had the honor of a seat in the Senate. It interests more people and affects a greater amount of property than any bill to-day on the Calendar of either House. It interests everybody in the country who eats meat, butter, or cheese, or drinks milk, or wears shoe-leather, everybody from the humble Irish woman with her little brindled bell-cow up to the great cattle king whose cattle graze on a thousand hills.

Senators, think of the immensity of the cattle interest. We had in 1880 40,000,000 neat cattle in this country, and as cattle double in number every three years, and about one-fourth of them are slaughtered for beef, we may reasonably calculate that we have to-day something over 50,000,000 head in the United States, worth not less than $30 a head, which amounts to fifteen hundred millions of money invested in cattle. It is the largest of all our varied industries; its annual production exceeds all the cotton, the sugar, the tobacco, the rice, and the wheat produced in this country. Now, what is that unexampled product? Twelve millions of cattle, the largest, fattest, and best, are slaughtered every year, worth not less than $600,000,000.

The National Dairy Association states that the butter crop annually is worth $350,000,000; cheese, $36,000,000; milk and cream $100,000,000; making a sum total of cattle production of $1,088,000,000 annually. How insignificant, then, every other industry appears when compared with this greatest of all. How small the iron industry, the woolen industry, the cotton industry, compared with this great cattle industry that is now asking Congress for aid and protection—protection not against competition, foreign or domestic, but protection against malignant diseases imported from abroad and planted in several States of this Union along our Atlantic seaboard, embracing the very ports from which we ship our live cattle abroad and through which we import most of the high-priced cattle brought here for breeding purposes.

This bill is directed chiefly against pleuro-pneumonia, although its provisions are broad enough to take in Texas fever. And why should it not take that in? Why should it be exempted? The bill is directed chiefly against pleuro-pneumonia, because foot-and-mouth disease, while it is a very contagious one, is not dangerous at all; it does not kill 2 per cent. of the cattle it attacks; it affects their flesh, and in England causes them to lose one year's growth, which is enormous in countries where it costs fifty or sixty dollars a year to keep an animal. But pleuro-pneumonia is a most fatal and pestilential disease, imported from foreign countries and domiciled in ours.

The Senator from Texas says that we have slandered and calumniated our own cattle; that we have placed a barrier by publishing the facts. Does he want us to act dishonestly in the matter? If the disease is in our own midst, why not investigate it, go at it and destroy it? Why shall we conceal it and cheat our customers in the Old World to which we send our products? I think honesty is the best policy always and at all times and everywhere. The most fatal of all diseases that afflict meat cattle are the rinderpest, which has never been in this country; the foot-and-mouth disease, which has been introduced, but by our quarantine arrangements, imperfect as they are, has been stamped out, and has not been allowed to spread generally through the country; but of all of them the most persistent, the most insidious, the most fatal, is the disease called contagious pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague, so pronounced by the veterinary surgeons, men of science, and doctors of the Old World and New World, who have given thirty years' labor to the investigation of this disease, its prevention and cure.

It is said to have originated in the center of Asia, whence have come all the plagues that have scourged our race. It made its appearance in Eastern Europe and desolated the steppes of Russia of their cattle, swept through the Carpathian Mountains into Austria and Bohemia, over Germany, Holland, Denmark, and Sweden, and has only been exterminated and extirpated by the most heroic treatment, by slaughter. It was carried to the south of Africa, to Cape Town, in the body of a single Dutch bull, and carried to Australia by a short-horn cow, and those two animals communicated the disease to the cattle of those remote countries, and in a few years all the great herds, amounting to many millions, have been destroyed, and those great ranges converted into sheep-walks. It was brought to the United States; to Brooklyn, N. Y., first; afterward to New Jersey and Pennsylvania in two or three importations, and has fastened itself there, and is there to-day. There can be no doubt about that.

The most eminent men in science have examined the question. You may say that veterinary surgeons are not men of science, but they are as highly accomplished and educated as any in the medical profession. The truth is that all the discoveries in medical science, both in pathology and anatomy, and the testing of remedies have all been made upon animals first; and the progress of medicine and surgery has been more through animal anatomy and pathology than all the other sources combined.

Why, sir, who was Humboldt? Who was Agassiz? Who was Cuvier? Who are all those naturalists who have thoroughly examined the habits, the nature, the structure, the anatomy, the physiology, and the whole make-up of the lower animals? They are men of science, who have made all the achievements in the medical profession as it relates to the human structure, animal and human pathology, animal and human anatomy. They are so nearly identical, that it is impossible for a man to be a good doctor in the one without some proficiency in the other. I do not like to hear these men sneered at as cow-doctors and horse-doctors, men of the very highest character for science in the land.

They tell us that this disease is in our midst; they tell us the danger is imminent, that if it once gets on the unfenced ranges of the West it is perfectly ineradicable; that it is possible by isolation, by slaughter. and disinfection to stamp it out in the circumscribed area in which it now exists, but if it once spreads on the prairies the cattle of the far West are gone.

It is perfectly apparent to my mind that the efforts of the States are wholly inadequate to remove this disease. It has assumed proportions too gigantic to be controlled by State efforts. The subject may have belonged to State jurisdiction once, but it has assumed such magnitude that I might say it has grown out of the jurisdiction of the States and has become a national one, and falls under the proper jurisdiction of Congress, for I do assert that a subject may grow beyond the power of a State and become so gigantic that it changes its character from being a subject of State jurisdiction and becomes a national one, as in this case.

In old times, before we had any railroads, the young cattle of the country were kept upon the farms where they were born until they were old enough to be fed. Then they were gathered up by a class of men who stall-fed them and put them upon the market. In this simple way of doing business there was little danger of contracting disease; but now, with our multiplied facilities for transportation a new system has sprung up. The stock of the country are raised until they are one, two, or three years old, and are taken to market by rail hundreds of miles through three or four States to the best markets of the country, and sold just like goods are sold, to be redistributed. How is it possible under this new system for State authority to meet the exigencies of this great demand and protect the health of our country? The thing is impossible. The States can not and will not do it.

Here is a great interest that is liable to be stricken down, as it has been in the Old World, in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, and the great demand for our meats is owing to the destruction of cattle in Eastern and Central Europe. That is what induced the British to undertake to raise cattle at Australia and Cape Town.

They were destroyed by this very disease that our people are invoking the aid of Congress to expel from our midst. It is useless to talk about putting our foreign trade on a better footing until we exterminate this disease at home. You can not prevent its spread without striking a blow at the disease itself. The States will not do it, and the nation must. That it has every power I have not a doubt, even to the extent of quarantine, absolute quarantine, between the States.

Let me say to the Senator from Texas and others who have spoken slightingly of this proposition, who have talked about it as a granger project, that the farmers and stock-raisers of the country hear with indignation the terms of opprobrium, the epithets of derision and contempt with which this bill is spoken of here.

Mr. COKE. The Senator will permit me to say that I used no such expressions at all. I represent as many millions of cattle as the Senator does hundreds of thousands, and I represent a farming constituency, and I used no such expressions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood that the Senator, in speaking of veterinary surgeons appointed by this Government, who were looking after this disease, treated them with great contempt. He dealt not only in anathema but in ridicule. His speech was filled with it. I may have misunderstood him, of course, and if I have I beg his pardon.

Mr. COKE. I spoke of the reports of the veterinary surgeons and the reports emanating from the Agricultural Department defamatory of the health of American cattle.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope I have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. President, I introduced a bill similar to this the very first session of my service in the Senate, and I have been pressing it ever since. I hope this bill will pass. The amount asked is a mere bagatelle when compared with the great interests involved, and I think the people are entitled, the farmers of this country are entitled, at the hands of Congress to something. I know that if it were a question involving great constitutional principles of law, if it were a question involving the rights of capitalists, they through their agencies would stir up a tremendous excitement over it; but the farmers have nobody here to speak for them; they have no lobby. I was in Chicago last fall, and there five hundred cattle-raisers met, representing twenty-six States and Territories of this Union, the most intelligent body of men I ever saw assembled together. They resolved to appoint a committee to visit Washington, and I think three of them came and staid two days and went home. That is the sort of lobby the farmers have. They trust, however, their claims in the hands of Congress, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, believing that they will do them justice.

ENROLLED BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal;

A bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard; and

A bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laurena C. P. Haskins.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate to present at this time the minority report on Senate joint resolution No. 19, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to granting the right to vote to the women of the United States. I ask that the minority report be printed with the majority report, which has been heretofore presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair). The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the document be reported at the desk.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is simply the views of the minority on the resolution referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage, Senate joint resolution No. 19. When the report was made, permission was given to the minority to submit their views at a subsequent time. These are the views of the minority of the committee. We ask that they be printed with the report.

Mr. INGALLS. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia. It will be so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of the executive committee of the Missouri branch of the Indian Rights Association of Missouri, praying for an increase of the appropriations made in the House appropriation bill for Indian education, signed by Bishop Robertson, of the diocese of Missouri, the chairman of the executive committee. I move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented a memorial of citizens of Monroe County, New York, protesting against the passage of certain patent bills; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HOAR. There were a large number of petitions and remonstrances, before that bill was recommitted, laid upon the table. I move that they all be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order has already been made, the Chair is informed by the Secretary.

Mr. FRYE presented a resolution of the members of the E. G. Parker Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Kittery, Me., indorsing the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 23, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. DOUGLAS F. FORREST, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LOAN OF FLAGS.

Mr. DOWD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan to the mayor and aldermen of the city of Charlotte, N. C., two hundred United States flags, to be used in decorating said city at the approaching celebration of the one hundred and ninth anniversary of the Mecklenberg declaration of independence of May 20, 1775: Provided, That satisfactory security be given for the safe return of said flags and that the Government be at no expense for transportation.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOWD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 2047) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That those persons being heads of families or single persons over 21 years of age who have made settlement and improvement upon, and are bona fide claimants and occupants of, either in person or by tenant, the lands in Kansas which were allotted to certain New York Indians, and for which certificates of allotment dated the 14th day of September, 1860, for three hundred and twenty acres of land each, were issued to thirty-two of said Indians, shall be, and hereby are, authorized and permitted to enter and purchase at the proper land office at any time within one year from the passage of this act, said lands so occupied by them, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres according to the Government surveys, at not less than $3 per acre, payment to be made in three annual installments, one-third at date of entry, one-third at the end of one year from date of entry, and the balance in two years from date of entry, with interest on said amounts respectively from date of entry at 6 per cent. per annum; and the moneys arising from such sales shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States in trust for and to be paid to said Indians, respectively, to whom said certificates were issued or to their heirs, upon satisfactory proof of their identity to the Secretary of the Interior at any time within five years from the passage of this act, and in case such proof is not made within the time specified, then the proceeds of such sale, or so much thereof as shall not have been paid under the provisions of this act, shall become a part of the public moneys of the United States.

SEC. 2. That any lands not entered by such settlers at the expiration of one year from the passage of this act shall be offered at public sale in the usual manner at not less than $3 per acre, notice of said sale to be given by public advertisement of not less than thirty days; and any tract or tracts not then sold, together with such tracts as have heretofore been, or may hereafter be entered, and wherein default has been made in the payment of any portion of the purchase-money, or the interest thereon, as herein or heretofore provided, shall be thereafter subject to private entry at the appraised value of said tracts.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out the following words: "In three annual installments, one-third at date of entry, one-third at the end of one year from date of entry, and the balance in two years from date of entry, with interest on said amounts respectively from date of entry at 6 per cent. per annum," and in lieu thereof insert "in cash at time of purchase."

In the second section strike out the following words: "Together with such tracts as have heretofore been, or may hereafter be, entered, and wherein default has been made in the payment of any portion of the purchase-money, or the interest thereon, as herein or heretofore provided."

Mr. BLOUNT. We can not understand the amendments as they are read.

Mr. SCALES. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Permit me to explain before the gentleman insists on his objection.

Mr. SCALES. Does this come from any committee of the House?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SCALES. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. PERKINS. It was reported unanimously, with two amendments, which have been read. There are about 8,000 acres of these lands occupied by the men provided for in this bill. They have been in possession for twenty years, constantly making improvements. There has been no litigation, but under existing law they can not acquire title to the lands they hold. The object of the bill is to give them an opportunity to get a title, and at the same time that something may be given to the Indians for their certificates of allotment. As it is now the Indians get nothing, while the settlers are without title. Every thing, therefore, is in a chaotic and confused condition. This is to relieve the existing embarrassment. The settlers are to pay $3 an acre for these lands which they have been in possession of for so many years and which they have cultivated and improved, and the money received is to be turned over to the Indians in interest.

Mr. SCALES. Does the gentleman from Kansas think that $3 an acre is enough for lands which these settlers have entered twenty years ago without authority? If these questions are answered satisfactorily I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object, and demand the regular order of business.

UNLAWFUL OCCUPANCY OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PAYSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 5479) to prevent unlawful occupancy of the public lands; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. At the suggestion of several gentlemen around me I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. HUNT. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, May 24, after the reading of the Journal, be assigned for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4987) for the encouragement of the American merchant marine, and to promote postal and commercial relations with foreign countries: Provided, Said bill is not sooner reached under the terms of the special order of February 29.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SINGLETON. I shall object to it unless it is modified to exclude from its operation the special order already assigned for business from the Committee on the Library.

Mr. RANDALL. And if that is incorporated I shall object to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless there is an exception in favor of reports from the Committee on the Public Lands, appropriation bills and revenue bills, I think objection will have to be made to it.

Mr. HUNT. I am perfectly willing to modify the resolution to meet the views of all gentlemen.

Mr. SINGLETON. I can not consent that the special order, the consideration of the Library bill, shall be set aside. If it makes the proper exception I will not object.

Mr. HUNT. As I have said, I will make all the modifications that are demanded.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House for consideration.

ZEB. WARD.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6756) for the relief of Zeb. Ward, of Little Rock, Ark.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order.

Mr. WELLER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the request for the regular order to give me permission to have printed in the RECORD a memorial of ex-Union soldiers praying the passage of certain House bills. This is a sample copy of a number of others which have been sent to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw the demand, so as to permit the request of the gentleman from Iowa to be made or for the reference of bills only.

The SPEAKER. The title of the memorial proposed by the gentleman from Iowa will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorial of ex-Union prisoners, praying the passage of House bill 1189 and Senate bill 44.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the printing of the memorial in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

The memorial is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EX-UNION PRISONERS OF WAR,
Cleveland, Ohio, April 3, 1884.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the ex-Union prisoners of war, through their national association, would respectfully set forth that they were soldiers and sailors in the service of the United States in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, and that while acting under the orders of their superior officers and performing the duties incident to such service they were made prisoners by the armed enemies of the United States and endured prolonged terms of imprisonment, and for various reasons this imprisonment was attended by the most extraordinary hardships. Even the very imperfect and incomplete records in possession of the War Department of the mortality among the Union prisoners of war shows that these hardships must have been incomparably greater than those incident to service in the field. Without going into details, it will only be necessary to point out that the death-rate among any given number of prisoners and at any given time was very much higher than among a corresponding number of soldiers engaged in the prosecution of an active campaign. For instance, the report of Professor Joseph Jones, the confederate surgeon in charge of the prison at Andersonville, shows the following percentage of deaths to the mean number of prisoners confined there in each of the first five months that the prison existed:

March, 1864	3.77
April, 1864	3.76
May, 1864	4.72
June, 1864	5.38
July, 1864	6.64
August, 1864	10.09

Professor Jones' report goes on to say: "We observe a progressive increase of mortality from 3.77 per cent. in March to 10.09 per cent. of mean strength in August. The ratio of mortality continued to increase during September, for notwithstanding the removal of one-half of the entire number of prisoners during the early portion of the month, 1,767 deaths are registered from September 1 to 21.

"The entire number of Federal prisoners was about 40,611, and during the period of near seven months, from February 24 to September 21, 9,479 deaths were recorded; that is, during this period nearly one-fourth, or, more exactly, one in 4.2, or 23.3 per cent., terminated fatally."

But even these figures fall very far short of properly representing the terrible mortality, for the reason that of the total of 40,611 prisoners received at Andersonville over 30,000 came in after the opening of the great campaigns in May, and the bulk of those that survived were taken away in September, so that many thousands who were brought to death's door there died in other prisons or on the road to them. Of those who were left behind at Andersonville, one in every three died in September, and one-half of the remainder died in October. When it is remembered that these were vigorous, healthy young men, nearly all from the fighting lines of Generals Grant and Sherman, and consequently seasoned to privation and hardship, and that the average imprisonment in Andersonville was less than three months, the destructive strain upon the constitution of even a short confinement becomes better understood.

It is the universal testimony that the conditions in the other prisons was much worse, and the accompanying loss of life much greater than in Andersonville, but as no statistics of Charleston, Cahaba, Columbia, Macon, Millen, Mobile, Camp Ford, Jackson, and Montgomery have ever been found, and those of Salisbury, Richmond, and Danville are very vague and imperfect, it is impossible to sustain these assertions with the proof of figures.

Enough is known, however, to make it beyond dispute that of the 125,000 prisoners who were taken from the time of the battle of Gettysburg, when the exchange was interrupted, to the close of the war, at least 60,000 died while in prisons or immediately after passing through our lines. The War Department has a record of 29,956 of these, and presumptive proof enough to swell the number to 47,445.

Your memorialists would therefore submit as an undeniable scientific truth that where the exposure of a body of men to privation and hardship has resulted in killing fully one-half of them in an incredibly short time, the strain on the constitutions of the survivors must have wrought hopeless and irreparable injury. All physicians agree that no man ever wholly recovers from any physical strain or injury. It is simply impossible that the man who managed to survive what killed so large a proportion of his comrades should not have his vital energies lowered, his capacity for work diminished, and his days shortened by what proved so fatal to them. It could not help disabling him as effectually as a crippling wound would have done.

Therefore your memorialists respectfully pray your honorable bodies to award to each prisoner of war such measure of relief as is contemplated by House bill 1189 and Senate bill 44.

Your memorialists would further submit as a sufficient reason for granting the pensions prayed for that the terms of their imprisonment were undoubtedly protracted and the evils from which they suffered greatly aggravated by the military necessity which compelled a refusal of exchange for many months toward the close of the war, that the Confederates in their military extremity might not have the benefit of 100,000 well fed, vigorous men whom the Government had in its military prisons. The retention in Southern prisons during the last part of 1864 and the early part of 1865 of some 30,000 or 40,000 starved and broken-down Union soldiers, neutralized, at the most critical period of the war, three or four times that number of stalwart and well-fed Confederate soldiers, who, had they been in the field, would have greatly increased the perplexity of the situation, protracted the war much longer, and added immensely to its cost. Your memorialists freely recognize that it was their soldierly duty to remain in prison if that would contribute to the advancement of the Government's military objects, and they did it with such cheerfulness and resignation as they could muster for any duty that the Government required of them, but they sustained grave physical injuries by so doing, and they claim that this entitles them to the same consideration and relief as if they received the same amount of injuries upon the march or the battle-field.

And thus your petitioners will ever pray.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, with the amendments of the Senate; and I am instructed further to move non-concurrence in all of the Senate amendments to that bill. And upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania if these are the amendments which embrace the provision for additional cruisers?

Mr. RANDALL. It includes all of the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand that it is the bill upon which the Senate has ingrafted an amendment providing for an increase of the Navy?

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate have increased the bill about six and one-half millions of dollars. It provides for the construction of additional cruisers.

Mr. REED. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence?

Mr. RANDALL. They do.

Mr. REED. Why?

Mr. RANDALL. The committee think that this is the best mode of procedure.

Mr. KASSON. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is proposed to consider these amendments in the House or in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. RANDALL. Under the rules, if the conference committee of the respective bodies should differ, it is competent——

Mr. KASSON. But the gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me finish my statement. I say it is competent in case of a disagreement to come into the House and report that fact or that they have agreed, as the case may be. It is then within the power of the House to recede or not, as it sees proper.

Mr. KASSON. But the gentleman does not seem to comprehend my question. There is of course no difficulty as far as the gentleman's statement is concerned with reference to the right of the House to agree or disagree to the report of the conference committee; but on the point of order these amendments should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now, what I ask is whether he wishes to consider these amendments in the House with some time for debate, or go into the Committee of the Whole under the rule and consider them there?

Mr. RANDALL. This is a motion to non-concur in all of the amendments of the Senate——

Mr. KASSON. But this raises the entire question of provision for the additional ships of war, and ought to be considered by the House. I desire that there may be some time for debate upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to execute the instructions of the Committee on Appropriations, to move non-concurrence in the amendments, and I have demanded the previous question, which of course will allow some debate.

Mr. KASSON. Then I make the point of order that the amendments should be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. REED. Under the rules of the House the point of order sends this to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that the report must first be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and pending that I move to limit debate to one-half minute.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that motion.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, if the gentleman from Iowa wants any debate and will indicate how much time, perhaps we can arrange it.

Mr. KASSON. It can not be done now at any rate. There must be some general debate before the motion to limit debate would be in order. Several gentlemen may want to be heard upon this. It is a very important question, and I will object to any limitation now.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman then objects to limiting debate to one-half minute at this time?

Mr. KASSON. I shall certainly object to such a limitation.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I shall withdraw the motion. I did not suppose the gentleman would object to a motion of that sort, my only object being to expedite the public business. There was no opposition, so far as I know, in the Committee on Appropriations to the course which I have indicated on the floor.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will see at once this raises the whole question of an increase of our naval equipment and provision for national defense, and I am not willing for one that the House should pro forma dissent absolutely from an appropriation for that purpose. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give assurance that he is disposed to allow an enlargement of the bill in the direction named, then so far as I am concerned——

Mr. RANDALL. What does the gentleman mean by an enlargement of the bill?

Mr. KASSON. I mean an enlargement of it by an additional appropriation for the further construction of naval vessels and the arming of them.

Mr. REED. I do not suppose that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in favor of arming them.

Mr. BUCKNER. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he is premature in raising this discussion now. If he waits till a conference report comes in, possibly his objection, whatever it is, may be obviated. If not, the committee of conference could then be instructed on the question at issue.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is now acting under authority of the Committee on Appropriations. I wish him simply to express the opinion of that committee, if he has authority to do it, that they are disposed to make some further provision in the direction indicated by the Senate amendments. If he has no authority to make any such declaration, then I desire some consideration of the Senate amendments in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no authority to commit any one but myself on that subject.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made, the bill and the Senate amendments are referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves that the House resolve itself——

Mr. RANDALL. I do not make that motion. I am under agreement to let the tariff discussion go on for the present.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand that the point of order has been decided?

The SPEAKER. It has; and the bill and amendments are now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDALL. I will state that one of the reasons which induced the Committee on Appropriations to recommend non-concurrence was to expedite the appropriation bills and to secure an early adjournment of Congress.

CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, letters from subordinate officers of customs at the port of New York in relation to the construction of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes and of civil-service laws as to preference given to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors; which was referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

JEAN DUGAT'S REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the case of the private land claim of the legal representatives of Jean Dugat, in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, and to move that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. REED. The same point of order applies to that bill as to the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. I think we had better consider it in the same way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reports back the Post-Office appropriation bill with Senate amendments, and recommends non-concurrence in the amendments. Is the reading of the amendments asked for?

Mr. KASSON. Reserving the point of order, I ask the gentleman from Illinois what are the principal amendments in which the committee recommend non-concurrence?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We recommend non-concurrence in all the amendments. The object is to get a committee of conference and to see if we can not come to an agreement.

Mr. KASSON. My impression is that there are some amendments adopted by the Senate in which we ought to concur under provisions of existing law. I make the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa that the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order that the amendments of the Senate must have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the bill then go to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It does.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal;

A bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard; and

A bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laurena C. P. Haskins.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 280) granting a pension to Wesley Morford;

A bill (S. 304) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a free bridge by the mayor and city of Nashville, Tenn., over the Cumberland River, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 316) granting a pension to Mrs. Katharina T. Wunsh;

A bill (S. 394) restoring to the pension-roll the name of Major D. Williams;

A bill (S. 626) to increase the pension of Francis Scott;

A bill (S. 689) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Barbour;

A bill (S. 732) for the relief of Mary J. Vaughan;

A bill (S. 783) to increase the pension of John Algoe;

A bill (S. 828) granting a pension to Thomas Patton;

A bill (S. 909) to increase the pension of Martin Kelly;

A bill (S. 1299) to increase the pension of Alonzo B. Chatfield;

A bill (S. 1680) granting a pension to George Prince;

A bill (S. 1850) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln; and

A bill (S. 1910) granting a pension to William McClure.

KANSAS CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I now call up the contested-election case of Wood vs. Peters, from the State of Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That S. R. Peters was duly elected a member of Congress from the State of Kansas, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. BENNETT. If this is the proper time to do so, I desire to submit a motion to substitute the resolutions contained in the report of the minority for the resolution reported by the majority.

The SPEAKER. This is the proper time to submit that motion. The gentleman from North Carolina proposes as a substitute for the resolution of the committee the resolutions reported by the minority, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Samuel R. Peters, of Kansas, is ineligible to the seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress now held by him.

Resolved, That Samuel N. Wood, of Kansas, is entitled to said seat.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state the facts of this case and call the attention of the House to the single question involved. At the November election in 1882 the electors of the State of Kansas voted for four members of Congress at large. The five candidates receiving the greatest number of votes were S. R. Peters, E. N. Morrill, B. W. Perkins, L. Hanback, and S. N. Wood. The contest is between S. R. Peters and S. N. Wood. Peters received 16,502 more votes than Wood and has qualified as a member of this House.

Wood claims the seat occupied by Peters on the sole ground that Peters was ineligible at the time of the election, and that all the votes cast for him are to be treated as though not polled. If Peters was ineligible, his ineligibility grew out of the following facts: Peters was elected judge of the district court of the ninth district of Kansas in November, 1879, for the term of four years, beginning on the second Monday of January, 1880, and ending on the second Monday of January, 1884. He qualified as judge of said district and continued to discharge the duties of the office until after the November election in 1882, but resigned some time prior to qualifying as a member of this House.

Article 3, section 13, of the constitution of Kansas, which was in full force at the time of the election in November, 1882, and is still a part of the constitution of that State, is as follows:

The justices of the supreme court and judges of the district courts shall at stated times receive for their services such compensation as may be provided by law, which shall not be increased during their respective terms of office: Provided, Such compensation shall not be less than $1,500 to each justice or judge each year; and such justice or judge shall receive no fee or perquisites, nor hold any office of profit or trust under the authority of the State or the United States during the term of office for which said justices or judges shall be elected, nor practice law in any of the courts of this State during their continuance in office.

Under the facts stated Peters was undoubtedly within the inhibition of this provision of the constitution of Kansas, and if the constitution of that State is binding upon this House, then it is very clear that Peters is not entitled to the seat he now occupies. So far as Peters's status is concerned the only question raised by the record is whether a State can superadd other qualifications for members of Congress than those prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. This is an important question, and if it was a new one would require very careful consideration, and there might have been room for differences of opinion, but other cases in this House and in the Senate have preceded this involving the same question, and after protracted and exhaustive discussion have all been decided in one way, and that against the power of the States to prescribe any other qualifications for members of Congress than those named in the Constitution of the United States. Article 1, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

The Constitution of the United States by this section prescribes certain qualifications for the office of Representative in Congress, and, having exercised the power, it has been exhausted, and neither Congress nor the States can add other qualifications. It comes within a well-settled rule of construction that the enumeration of certain requisites of qualification is equivalent to a prohibition of authority to impose others. This position is greatly strengthened by a quotation made by the minority in their report from the remarks of Mr. Dickinson, made in the constitutional convention when the section of the Constitution relating to qualifications of Representatives in Congress was under consideration. Mr. Mason moved—

That the committee of detail be instructed to receive a clause requiring certain qualifications of landed property and citizenship of the United States in members of the National Legislature, and disqualifying persons having unsettled accounts with or being indebted to the United States from being members of the National Legislature.

Speaking upon this resolution, Mr. Dickinson said:

I am against any recital of qualifications in the Constitution. It is impossible to make a complete one, and a partial one would by implication tie up the hands of the legislature from supplying omissions.—Elliott's Debates on the Constitution, volume 5, pages 370 and 371.

It is difficult to understand why this extract from Mr. Dickinson's speech was quoted by the minority in their report unless it was for the purpose of giving the greatest possible sanction to the views expressed in the report of the majority. It is a significant fact also that no member of the convention who spoke after Mr. Dickinson attempted to controvert the correctness of the principle enunciated by him. The minority in their report have not quoted with entire accuracy the language employed by Mr. Dickinson. As he is reported in Elliott's Debates he uses the word "legislature" instead of "legislatures," and it is evident that he meant the National Legislature, or, in other words, Congress. He was speaking to the resolution of Mr. Mason, and in that resolution Congress is designated by the words "National Legislature."

What Mr. Dickinson intended to say and did say was that an enumeration of certain qualifications for Representatives in Congress would by implication tie up the hands of Congress from supplying omissions.

I thank the gentleman who prepared the minority report for this most valuable authority—the authority of a distinguished member of that illustrious body which framed the Constitution we are called upon to construe.

From whence do the States derive power to prescribe qualifications for members of Congress? The power is not delegated to them by any provision of the Constitution of the United States. The office is essentially a Federal one, and it is clear to me that unless some section of the Constitution of the United States can be pointed out which gives the States the power to prescribe qualifications for Representatives in the Congress of the National Government no such power exists.

The minority of the committee contend that this power is found among the reserved rights of the States, and article 10 of the amendments to the Constitution, which provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Con titution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," is cited in support of the position. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted by the people comprising the then States an essentially new government was created, and its powers under its organic law are not to be interpreted or ascertained by reference to the temporary compact between the States which preceded it under the Articles of Confederation.

Congress such as we now have under the Constitution is a creature of that instrument, and the States did not prior to the birth of the National Government possess the right to send representatives to a congress which had no existence; and it is seemingly clear that they did not possess the power to prescribe qualifications for representatives to a body unknown to the world until the adoption of the Federal Constitution. I think it is very plain that article 10 of the amendments to the Constitution can have no application to the question involved in this case. The right of the people of the States to send Representatives to the Congress of the United States is not a right growing out of the sovereignty of the respective States. The right to elect Representatives to Congress does not spring from the State governments, but is a right growing out of the formation of the National Government. The States could not have reserved powers they did not possess. The eligibility of a person to an office can only be ascertained by reference to the law under which the office was created. Any other doctrine might be exceedingly disastrous in its results.

If it is once established that the States can prescribe qualifications for Representatives in Congress, then they may prescribe as many and such as they please. They may impose such qualifications as would render ineligible nine-tenths of the citizens of the United States who are qualified under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. We would have very likely one class of citizens disqualified under the constitution of one State, and another class under the constitution or laws of another State. We have an illustration of what would take place in the case at hand. The constitution of Kansas provides that all her judges shall be ineligible. Other States have no such provision. The citizens of the United States residing within the limits of the State of Kansas are prohibited from choosing as their Representatives in Congress certain of their number who have been citizens of the United States for more than seven years and are upward of 25 years of age. The same class of citizens who are ineligible in Kansas possess all the qualifications prescribed by the constitution of Pennsylvania, and may be sent here by the citizens of Pennsylvania to represent them in Congress.

The State of New York might provide in her constitution that no citizen should be eligible to a seat in Congress unless he was the owner of real estate of the value of $20,000; and Virginia might say that no citizen of the State who owned a foot of real estate should represent her people in the National Legislature.

If the views of the minority shall be adopted, representation in the Congress of the National Government will be under the control of the State governments, and such qualifications could be prescribed as would prevent representation and destroy Congress.

I think the question involved in this case is too well settled to require elaborate argument at this time. I desire to call the attention of the House to a few of the authorities on this subject. I quote from Story on the Constitution, volume 1, sections 626 and 627:

Now it may properly be asked where did the States get the power to appoint Representatives in the National Government? Was it a power that existed at all before the Constitution was adopted? If derived from the Constitution must it not be derived exactly under the qualifications established by the Constitution, and none others? If the Constitution "has delegated no power to the States to add new qualifications, how can they claim any such power by the mere adoption of that instrument which they did not before possess?"

The truth is that the States can exercise no powers whatsoever which exclusively spring out of the existence of the National Government which the Constitution does not delegate to them. They have just as much right, and no more, to prescribe new qualifications for a Representative as they have for a President. Each is an officer of the Union, deriving his powers and qualifications from the Constitution, and neither created by, dependent upon, nor controllable by the States. It is no original prerogative of State power to appoint a Representative, a Senator, or President for the Union.

I also cite Paschal's Annotated Constitution, page 305, which is to the same effect.

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, volume 1, page 28, note F, says:

The question whether the individual States can superadd to or vary the qualifications prescribed to the Representative by the Constitution of the United States is examined in Mr. Justice Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 1, pages 99 to 103, but the objections to the existence of any such power appear to me to be too palpable and mighty to admit of any discussion.

I am not aware that any law-writer of ability has ever taken the opposite view to that so clearly expressed by the two eminent jurists from whom I have quoted. The precedents established by this House and the United States Senate most clearly sustain the view taken by the majority of the Elections Committee in this case.

The cases of Turney vs. Marshall and Fouke vs. Trumbull, of Illinois, to be found in Bartlett's Contested-Election Cases, from 1834 to 1865, page 167, are directly in point. The tenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of the State of Illinois, which was adopted on the 6th day of March, 1848, is in the words following:

The judges of the supreme and circuit courts shall not be eligible to any other office or public trust of profit in this State or the United States during the term for which they were elected, nor for one year thereafter. All votes for either of them for any elective office (except that of judge of the supreme or circuit court) given by the General Assembly or the people shall be void.

Marshall and Trumbull had been judges of Illinois and at the time they were elected to Congress were within the prohibitory provisions of the constitution of that State. The two cases were considered together by the Committee on Elections, and they reported to the House that in the opinion of the committee a State could not add to the qual ifications prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for Representatives in Congress. The minority of the committee insist that the report in the Illinois cases was made long after the cases were disposed of by the House, and that these cases are not authority upon the question involved in the case under consideration. The facts are that Mr. Bingham, in offering the resolutions in these cases, stated as clearly the questions involved as they appear in the report subsequently made and said that he would file a report very soon.

As to Marshall, the discussion was made upon the single question of the power of a State to superadd to the qualifications prescribed to Representatives in Congress by the Constitution of the United States. It was not pretended that he was not within the spirit as well as the letter of the prohibitory provision of the constitution of Illinois. Marshall's term of office as judge would not have expired until the 10th of June, 1855. He resigned on the 10th of August, 1854, and was elected a Representative in Congress on the 7th of November, 1854. He resigned the office of judge less than three months prior to his election as a Representative in Congress.

The resolution that Marshall was duly elected and was entitled to his seat was adopted by the House without division, and the resolution that Fouke, the opponent of Trumbull, was not entitled to a seat was passed by the decisive vote of 125 to 5. The same arguments that are now made in the minority report were then stated in an exceedingly able argument made by Mr. Harris, of Illinois, in favor of the binding force of the Illinois constitution.

Randolph's opinion and Jefferson's doubting letter were quoted. There can be no doubt, therefore, about the question upon which the Illinois cases turned.

Trumbull's case, determined by the Senate in 1855 by the decided vote of 35 to 8 in favor of his right to a seat in the United States Senate notwithstanding he was within the prohibitory provisions of the constitution of Illinois, would seem to be authority on the question we now have under consideration, which is entitled to great respect.

In the debate on Trumbull's case, Senator Pugh of Ohio, stated the position now taken by the minority of the commitee, with great power, but when the vote was taken the Senate declared against the position of Senator Pugh by nearly five to one. I submit that Senator Pugh's opinions are not to be considered authority against the determination of the Senate. The decision of the court is better authority than the opinions of the advocates of either side of the case.

I will not longer take the time of the House in the discussion of this question. The report of the majority of the committee is sustained by the ablest law-writers of the country, who have discussed the question; it is sustained by the cases heretofore determined by this House and the Senate, and I believe the committee will be sustained by the House in the case now under consideration, and the question settled for all time to come.

If Peters was ineligible it is beyond question the well-settled rule of this country that the minority candidate is not entitled to be seated. In this case the majority against Wood was 16,502. It requires a reasonable amount of assurance on the part of Wood to ask for a seat in this House after his own people have repudiated him by so decided a majority, but if he is legally entitled to it it should be given him.

The minority in their report cite many authorities to sustain the position that when the majority candidate is ineligible the minority candidate is entitled to the office. Nearly all the authorities cited are English, and the English rule has never been adopted in this country. I shall content myself with citing a few leading cases and authorities on this question for the reason that in my judgment the House will not reach the consideration of this question. This House in the case of Smith vs. Brown, 2 Bartlett, 395, determined by a vote of 102 to 30 that the minority candidate was not entitled to a seat when the majority candidate was ineligible. Mr. DAWES, in the course of an able report in the case referred to, says:

> The will of the majority expressed in conformity with established law is the very basis on which rest the foundations of our institutions, and any attempt to substitute therefor the will of the minority is an attack upon the fundamental principle of the Government, and if successful will prove their overthrow.

It is, however, claimed that this House in the cases of Hodge vs. Reed and Wallace vs. Simpson, both from South Carolina, declared that minority candidates were entitled to be seated when it appeared that the majority candidates were ineligible under the second clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The minority of the committee fall into grave error when they make the statement that any such doctrine was established by the House in these cases. I have carefully examined the record, and ascertain that just the contrary is true.

In the case of Hodge vs. Reed (Election Cases of 1869–'70, page 540), the committee reported that Hodge was entitled prima facie to the seat. The board of canvassers issued a certificate to Hodge after one had been issued to Reed, and their reason for so doing was made the basis of the Election Committee's report. The board of canvassers state their reasons as follows:

> That the election at which the said Reed appears to have been elected was accompanied by such grave and widespread disorder and outrages on the part of the political friends of the said Reed as in their judgment to make the apparent result different from the result which a free and orderly citizen would have secured.

In the case of Wallace vs. Simpson (Contested-Election Cases, 1869-'70, page 553) the House on the 25th of January, 1870, adopted the resolution reported by the minority of the Committee on Elections, which is as follows:

> Resolved, That W. D. Simpson is not entitled under resolution of March —, 1869, to a seat from the third district of South Carolina, by reason of ineligibility, and that A. S. Wallace is not entitled to such seat, because he was not by the greatest number of votes duly elected by the people of that district.

This case was subsequently reported to a committee on the merits, and it is claimed that the House in seating Wallace on the report made by Mr. Cessna recognized the doctrine that a minority candidate is entitled to the seat when the majority candidate is ineligible.

The committee to whom this case was referred was Cessna, RANDALL, and HALE. Cessna made the report to the House, and when he did so stated that both his colleagues differed with him as to the proposition that—

> When one of two candidates is ineligible the votes given for him are of no effect and the other candidate is elected.

The case was really determined by the committee and the House on the ground that—

> Intimidation and violence may invalidate the vote of a precinct or county, and the vote in the peaceable counties is to determine the result.

See Election Cases 1869–'70, page 731.

The precedents of this House, then, are all against the proposition that minority candidates can under any circumstances be seated. McCrary, in his work on Elections, page 209, lays down the American rule as follows:

> Thus it will be seen that the weight of authority in this country is decidedly against the adoption here of the English doctrine. And we think that sound policy, as well as reason and authority, forbids the adoption of that doctrine in this country. It is a fundamental idea with us that the majority shall rule; and that a majority, or at least a plurality, shall be required to elect a person to office by popular vote. An election with us is the deliberate choice of a majority or plurality of electors. Any doctrine which opens the way for minority rule in any case is anti-republican and anti-American.

I trust that the man who was fairly elected by an overwhelming majority may be allowed to retain the seat he now occupies, and that this House will not now commit itself to the doctrine that the qualifications of members can be fixed by the States.

Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the contestant, Mr. S. N. Wood, may be heard for an hour.

The SPEAKER. The House has heard the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD (the contestant) proceeded to address the House, and at the expiration of an hour the hammer fell.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAY. I ask consent of the House that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. RYAN. I hope that the time may be extended until the gentleman has finished his remarks.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the time of the gentleman will be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD (the contestant) resumed and concluded his remarks. [See Appendix.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of a paragraph I once saw, taken from some Western paper. The editor of the paper went to church on a Sabbath evening. In preparing the announcement of the service in his next week's paper he stated that he had attended the church on the Sabbath evening and listened to a very fine discourse, but was unable to hear the conclusion of it, for the reason that he had to go home for breakfast. I hardly expected to be able to make any remarks to-day on this case for the reason that I feared before the contestor could complete the reading of his very lengthy remarks the day would have ended.

After the able presentation of the case by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT] and the searching legal argument made by him, it is unnecessary for me to say anything on the legal points of this case. I shall detain this House for but a few moments in order to present one or two features in connection with the case which have not been presented, and which, in justice to myself, I deem it necessary to present.

So far as it is necessary to state the vote in this case, it is as follows:

S. R. Peters (contestee)	99,866
E. N. Morrill	98,340
B. W. Perkins	98,338
L. Hanback	97,357
S. N. Wood (contestor)	83,364

Four candidates for Congress were elected from the State at large. The members of the House will therefore see that the contestor in this case lacked 16,502 votes of a majority; in other words, that the sitting member received 16,502 more votes than the contestor. There is no claim of any fraud; there is no claim on the part of any one that in this case there were any illegal votes.

But the claim is put forward that by reason of these votes having been cast for a person who was ineligible therefore they were as so much blank paper and should be cast aside and not counted. And this position was assumed because of the notice which it was claimed was given to the voters of the ineligibility of the sitting member. To this point I wish to call the attention of the House for a few moments.

This notice, if it was valid at all, was either an actual or a constructive notice, or perhaps both. I know it is an old maxim which is not to be denied, that every voter is presumed to know the law. But it is also a fact that if the voter is presumed to know the law he is also presumed to know the construction that has been placed upon that law by the courts of the State and by the legal writers who have written on the subject, and not only by the courts of the State and the legal writers who have written on the subject, but also by any tribunal that has had occasion to pass on the questions. It is claimed that the constructive notice was obtained by reason of the provision in the constitution of the State of Kansas. So far as it applies to this case, that provision is as follows:

The justices of the supreme court and judges of the district courts shall at stated times receive for their services such compensation as may be provided by law, which shall not be increased during their respective terms of office: Provided, Such compensation shall not be less than $1,500 to each justice or judge each year; and such justice or judge shall receive no fee or perquisites nor hold any office of profit or trust under the authority of the State or the United States during the term of office for which said justices or judges shall be elected, nor practice law in any of the courts of the State during their continuance in office.

That is the provision of the constitution which, as claimed by the minority report, notified all the voters of the State of Kansas of the ineligibility of the sitting member. Now, if there was nothing further than this, if there had been no judicial construction placed upon this provision of the constitution, then the claim of the minority of the committee might be of some force. But when you consider the proposition which I asserted a few moments ago, that in so far as this constructive notice operates it must embrace also the decisions made by the courts and the proper tribunals in construing any provision of law, you will see that whatever notice this constitutional provision gave must be taken in connection with the notice which was given by these tribunals in construing this provision of the constitution.

Now, the voter of Kansas who started out to find the construction of law in relation to this constitutional provision having heard something of Justice Story, a noted law-writer, and believing him to have been a man recognized as high authority by the courts of the country, would at once turn to that author and endeavor to ascertain what construction he had placed upon this character of prohibitions in State constitutions.

Turning to Story on Constitution, the voter reads:

If a State Legislature has authority to pass laws to this effect, they may impose any other qualifications beyond those provided by the Constitution, however inconvenient, restrictive, or even mischievous they may be to the interests of the Union. The Legislature of one State may require that none but a Deist, a Catholic, a Protestant, a Calvinist, or a Universalist shall be a Representative. The Legislature of another State may require that none shall be a Representative but a planter, a farmer, a mechanic, or a manufacturer. It may exclude merchants, and divines, and physicians, and lawyers. Another Legislature may require a high-moneyed qualification, a freehold of great value, or personal estate of great amount. Another Legislature may require that a party shall have been born and always lived in the State or district, or that he shall be an inhabitant of a particular town or city. In short, there is no end to the varieties of qualifications which, without insisting upon extravagant cases, may be imagined. A State may, with the sole object of dissolving the Union, create disqualifications so high and so singular that it shall become impracticable to elect any Representatives.

And again he reads from the same author:

The truth is that the States can exercise no powers whatsoever which exclusively spring out of the existence of the National Government, which the Constitution does not delegate to them. They have just as much right, and no more, to prescribe new qualifications for a Representative as they have for a President; each derives his powers and qualifications from the Constitution, and is neither created by, dependent upon, nor controllable by the States. It is no original prerogative of State power to appoint a Representative, a Senator, or President for the Union. These owe their existence and functions to the united voice of the whole, not a portion of the people.

From this reading the voter would be notified by the high authority of Judge Story that this provision in regard to the ineligibility of the sitting member was absolutely null and void.

And the voter might go further. Having learned that Chancellor Kent was a man well recognized as high authority in the law, that he was the Blackstone of America, he might turn to the first volume of Kent's Commentaries and find that this learned writer approves the construction placed upon the law by Justice Story. Thus he would see that two renowned legal authors declare this inhibition in the constitution of the State of Kansas to be absolutely null and void.

But not content with this, he would go to the only tribunal that has power to pass finally upon a question of this kind; and there he would ascertain that in the case of Fouke vs. Trumbull and the case of Turner vs. Marshall, both these cases having been decided in the House of Representatives, and also in the Trumbull case in the Senate, it had been declared emphatically by these bodies respectively that these inhibitions in State constitutions are in conflict with the national Constitution, and therefore null and void.

I ask any reasonable member of the House whether the constructive notice in this case did not notify the voter of the State of Kansas that the inhibition of the State constitution was null and void, and, therefore, the ineligibility of the sitting member could not be maintained on that ground.

Why, sir, to hear gentlemen speak on the part of the minority of the committee, one would think that the voters of the State of Kansas had nothing to do but study laws and constitutions upon these questions. I desire to say that the people of Kansas find something to do besides studying the laws and the constitutions of the States and of the United States. It would be strange if the voter of Kansas were obliged to acquaint himself with these laws and the constructions of the courts to decide which was right and which was wrong, and, if he should decide wrongfully, lose his vote for Representative in Congress. The voters of the State of Kansas found time during the last year to raise 200,000,000 bushels of corn and 27,000,000 bushels of wheat. Ay, sir, they found time during the last year to raise wheat, corn, oats, rye, and flaxseed of the value of $93,440,000—$12,000,000 more than the entire value of the gold and silver product of the United States for the same year. Let my distinguished friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], who prides himself justly upon representing the gold and silver Rocky Mountain mining camp, put that under the brim of his sombrero.

McPherson County in my district is now, and has been for two years, the banner wheat and broom-corn county of the world, and yet this county in age is not half-way through its "teens."

Sir, in the district in which I now reside there is a county named after the lamented General Sedgwick that raised 7,000,000 bushels of corn last year, and only a short time ago loaded up a train of thirty cars with corn and sent them to Cincinnati as a gift-offering to relieve the sufferers by the Ohio flood. Another county in my State, in the district of my colleague [Mr. RYAN]—and I will charge him nothing for this advertisement—a county named Butler, found time to send twenty-seven car-loads to Cincinnati as a gratuitous offering to the sufferers by the Ohio flood. The nation has donated generously out of its plethoric Treasury, but these two counties alone have given ten thousand dollars' worth of corn.

The people of Kansas have something else to do, and they do something else, than study up constitutional questions. I know it is said, and it may be truthfully said, that Kansas is only the third State in the Union in the raising of agricultural products; but you must bear in mind that Kansas is young yet. When the procession of States passes under the wire in the year 1900 Kansas will be in the lead and will be looking back over her shoulder to see what older State is blinking in the dust of her progress. It must be a bad day when the average Kansan can not inject a first-class advertisement into the driest kind of a legal argument. But to return to the question of notice.

Now, if the voter of the State of Kansas is bound by constructive notice, as claimed, then this notice says to him that the inhibition in the constitution of that State is nugatory and void, and he can therefore go and vote for the person of his choice with the greatest assurance that this constitutional provision will not be enforced.

It is claimed that notice was given through the newspapers of the State by a discussion, and that this discussion was sufficient to apprise the voters of the ineligibility of the sitting member. A discussion in the newspapers presents the idea that there are two sides to be discussed. If there was but one side to it, and that was the side as claimed by the contestor, then there would have been nothing to discuss; but the very fact there was discussion in the newspapers suggests at once the idea that the newspapers themselves discussed not an ex parte case but that they discussed both sides of this case, and if they discussed both sides of this case they also presented not only the clause of the constitution of the State of Kansas now under consideration, but they presented also to the voter through the public prints the rulings of the various tribunals on that clause of the constitution, and those rulings declared it to be null and void; so that, view it as you please, consider it an actual or constructive notice, either or both, they were in favor of the rights of the sitting member and entirely opposed to the rights of the contestor.

Was the voter bound to know that Story and Kent were wrong; was the voter bound to know that the House of Representatives in the Trumbull and Marshall cases was wrong; was the voter bound to know the United States Senate was wrong? And I say, as a matter of law, that, right or wrong, the decision of this tribunal was binding on the voters, and is in favor of the eligibility of the sitting member.

But I go further than this and say that under the great weight of authority in this matter the question of notice is unimportant.

Now, I will not cite any authorities in relation to that point. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT] has cited all the authorities on the question. They are all one way, except in the case of the few authorities from the State of Indiana. Those of you who have given any attention to the minority report in this case will have ascertained that contestor relies almost altogether on English authority, and I submit these English authorities are not of much force on that subject in this country because of the difference in the two governments. In one of them the voice of the queen is the voice of God, while in the United States the voice of the people is the voice of God. But I will not take up the time of the House by citing any authorities on this question.

But I hear some one say, why are you so interested in this branch of the case? If you are not eligible to a seat why need you have any uneasiness or anxiety about who should occupy it? Permit me to suggest I have an intimate acquaintance with the sitting member, and I have been on terms of closest confidence with him for forty-one years, and that I know the reason why the sitting member has anxiety in relation to this branch of the case. And I will state the reason for his anxiety. If there is any member of the House who has doubt on the legal question involved in this case then he should give the people who sent me here the benefit of that doubt and resolve it in favor of the voice of the people.

Again, I do not desire to have the people of the State of Kansas who have been so kind to me punished, and that is another reason why I have anxiety on this branch of the case. On account of the people of the State of Kansas, and especially on account of the people of that judicial district over which the sitting member had the honor to preside for eight years, that elected him three successive times to a judicial position without any opposition, and which also voted to send him here with almost the same unanimity, if there is any one to be punished for the offense claimed by the contestor to have been committed against the constitution of Kansas, I say then punish me, but do not punish my people by putting in my place a Representative whom they have repudiated by 16,502 votes.

I might add right here that the Congressional district in which I now reside has to-day renominated me for election as a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress by acclamation, so that if I have sinned against the Constitution that is a pardon extended to me by my people which is very gratifying to my feelings. I will accept that renomination without much deliberation, and as it is equivalent to an election, if you put me down and out of the Forty-eighth Congress, I will rise up again in the Forty-ninth, when none can molest or make me afraid.

I have referred to the cases of Marshall and Trumbull. I desire to call attention to another feature in this case in connection with the decision in those noted cases. The contestant as well as the report made by the minority of the committee seek to break the force of the decisions and conclusions reached in the cases referred to by showing that while Trumbull and Marshall violated the letter of the law, they did not violate the spirit of the law; and therefore we may reasonably conclude that if the sitting member here has not violated the spirit of the law he is entitled to a seat by parity of reasoning.

Let us see now if the sitting member has violated the spirit of the law in this case, and if so in what respect. The spirit of the law is that a judge shall not use his judicial position for the purpose of securing political preferment. Is not that the spirit of the law? Where is there a man within or without the sound of my voice that will dare charge that the sitting member in this case ever used his judicial position to secure political preferment? If such had been the case, could it not and would it not easily have been shown? Would the evidence not have been seized upon? Could it not have been easily procured and referred to the Committee on Elections? And if there had been such evidence, and it was true, it would have been most damaging to the sitting member and against his right to a seat, because it would show that he was not only unworthy to hold a judicial position, but that he was also unfitted to hold a seat upon this floor, and he should be spurned from this Hall. In the absence of such proof (and there is absolutely no proof attempted to be brought of that kind), but in the absence of such proof, the presumption of honesty and official rectitude is in favor of the sitting member thus far in the case. But it is claimed further that Marshall and Trumbull resigned before the election, and therefore they did not violate the spirit of the law by being in office at the time of the election. I say to you that a proper exercise of official duty never violated the spirit of a law. It is the misuse of official position that wounds the spirit of the law if it is wounded at all. Therefore the question whether Marshall and Trumbull were upon the bench at the date of the election is no factor in determining the legal question presented here.

But how is the comparison when carried a little further? At the time the judgments in favor of Trumbull and Marshall in this House and in the Senate were given, the inhibition in the Illinois constitution, if it ever was of any force, had not expired, but existed against them—that is to say, the expiration of the official term and one year thereafter had not expired as required by the constitution of that State. Consequently if that inhibition was in force it was bearing directly against them, not only at the time of election but also at the time the judgment was pronounced in their favor. How is it in the case now under consideration? It is disclosed that the sitting member was last elected to the bench in the year 1879, for four years; and hence you will readily see that the inhibition of the constitution of the State of Kansas, if it ever was of any force, has long since ceased to operate or exist in the present case.

I now desire to call attention to the constitutional inhibition under consideration and submit a few thoughts in addition to those so ably presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT]. I assert—

First. That the inhibition, if of any force at all, is nothing more than a mere request. If the State can constitutionally command that a person shall not be eligible, but has no power to enforce the command, then it ceases to be a command. And even conceding that the right to prescribe additional qualifications was reserved to the State, there being no power to enforce the right, it amounts to nothing more than a mere request. In short, conceding the right of a State to prescribe qualifications to have been reserved by the State and by the people, the fact that the power to enforce was not reserved renders any prescribed qualification inoperative, and of no further force than a mere request. The Legislature of the State might by a joint resolution make the same request, or the voters might by a petition make the same request as to additional qualifications other than those prescribed in the Constitution of the United States; but, being powerless to enforce these qualifications, they could not be considered anything more than a mere request.

Waiving all questions of conflict between the national and State constitutions for the sake of the argument upon this branch of the case, we assert then that the prohibitory clause in the constitution of the State of Kansas was simply a request to the people of the State not to elect a judge to a national office during the term for which he had been elected to a judicial position, which request the people might or might not heed, as best suited their supreme will. That the voters of the State have so interpreted this provision is supported by their actions on several occasions. In 1870 Hon. D. P. Lowe, judge of the sixth judicial district of the State, whose term as judge had not expired, was elected as a Representative from the State at large to the Forty-second Congress. In 1874 Hon. W. R. Brown, my predecessor as judge of the ninth judicial district, and whose term had not expired, was elected as Representative from the third district to the Forty-fourth Congress. In the same year Hon. John R. Goodin, judge of the seventh judicial district, whose term had not expired, was elected as a Representative to the Forty-fourth Congress from the second. He was a Democrat, and defeated Hon. S. A. Cobb, the Republican candidate, who was a member of the Forty-third Congress from the State of Kansas. This clause of the constitution was then treated and considered as a mere request not only by Republican voters of the State but also by the Democratic voters of the State.

Second. The State can not superadd qualifications. The decision in the Marshall and Trumbull case was right then and is right now, and the inhibition in the Kansas constitution so far as it applies to members of Congress is null and void. The eligibility under the national Constitution is conceded. If eligible under the national Constitution, can a State constitution render the same person ineligible? If so, then the latter can nullify the former, and the lesser becomes the greater. It is argued that there is no conflict between the national and State constitutions in relation to the qualifications of a member of Congress; or that the clause of the national Constitution is simply negative and prohibitory, and hence, the State has the right to add affirmative qualifications. If the State has the power to add to the qualifications set out in the national Constitution, then to render the power valid and forceful it must be able to enforce the qualification or it must have the right to call upon Congress to enforce it. The State is powerless to enforce such a law, because it has affirmatively granted that power to the House. The House can not enforce a State law because it is a legislative and not an executive body.

Concede the absurd proposition that the National Government has the right to enforce a State law without being legally invoked by the State, and it would not be the legislative but the executive department that would be called upon to enforce such law. If the legislative department should be called upon to enforce such a law it would place it in conflict with the executive department, which is the only law-enforcing power in the Government. If the State then can enact a law and can call upon the House to enforce it, then a single State and the House can destroy the representation of that State in Congress, and a number of States acting in concert with the House can destroy the Government. National disintegration would thus be made easy. Any law that gives to the State the power to destroy the Government is in conflict with the national Constitution, and also with the very spirit and essence of the Government itself.

If a State may add to the qualifications of a member, then it may say that the member shall not be more than 27 years old; the national Constitution says he shall not be less than 25; and if the State can say he shall not be more than 27, it can thus nullify the spirit of our national Constitution, which seeks the benefit of age and experience in its legislative department. If this can be done, then a State could pass a law that no person should serve more than one term in Congress, and call upon the House to enforce it; and yet where is the statesman, either actual or fancied, that would assert that a State could enact a law that would prevent the re-election of a member of Congress, and have the right to demand of the House an enforcement of such a law. Again, the national Constitution says, in substance, the member must be a citizen of the United States for seven years. If the State can add additional qualifications it can say that no person who is American-born shall be eligible, and that only persons who have been born in England, or Ireland, or Germany, and who have been citizens of the United States not less than seven years nor more than ten years, shall be eligible. The statement of the proposition carries with it its own refutation.

If the additional qualification prescribed in the Kansas constitution now under consideration is not in conflict with the provisions of the national Constitution, then none of those provisions instanced by me would be in conflict. The legal principle involved is the same; the absurdity of the proposition does not affect its legality. The proposition may be absurd and unreasonable and unjust and dangerous to the very life of the Government itself; but if you concede the right of the State to add any additional qualifications to those prescribed in the national Constitution, then you must concede this power to its fullest extent, limited only by the prohibition in the Constitution of the United States.

The provisions of section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution, fixing the qualifications of the Representative, standing alone are in the nature of a negative prohibition; but when taken in connection with section 5 and with the first clause of section 2 it is an affirmative provision, and according to the rule of law well established and now never questioned, that the express mention of certain things in a provision excludes all others, a State is prohibited from affixing any additional qualifications to those of members of Congress. To place any other construction upon the constitutional provision under consideration is not only unreasonable in itself, but leads to the destruction of the very life which it was intended to promote and maintain.

Again, sovereignty must reside with the power to enforce. Sovereignty denotes the possession of the highest power in any given sphere. As applied to the qualifications of a member of Congress, it denotes the possession of the highest power to determine these qualifications. Is there any doubt or question as to where this power is lodged? Concede this power to have existed in the State prior to the formation of the National Government; what follows? When the National Government was created and the national Constitution was accepted by the States they delegated this power to the General Government. If the power to determine the qualifications of a member of Congress was delegated to Congress, then the sovereignty of the State over the qualifications of a member of Congress passed also with the power, because the sovereignty must reside with the power. The sovereignty, to prescribe a part of the qualifications, could not be retained by the State and the remaining part and the power to enforce all be delegated to Congress. Sovereignty in any given sphere in the very nature of political association is indivisible. A division of sovereignty over any given subject-matter would beget conflict.

There is not a single right reserved to the State which the State has not the power to enforce. The National Government can not go into a State and enforce a State law. If the State delegated to the General Government the power to make a law, it also delegated the power to enforce it. If a State reserved the right to make a law, it also reserved the power to enforce it. The power to make and the power to enforce are both necessary to create the sovereignty.

Hence if the States delegated to the General Government the power to enforce certain qualifications this delegation of power carried with it all of the power both to make and to enforce the qualifications, and the right of a State to prescribe any qualifications does not exist.

Again, article 1, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States prescribes the component parts of the House of Representatives: "Shall be composed of members;" declares how often they shall be chosen, "chosen every second year by the people of the several States." Prescribes the character of the people who shall vote in the States, "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors in the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." It then fixes the qualification of the member by saying, in substance, he must be 25 years old, a citizen of the United States of seven years' standing, and an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen.

If the Constitution of the United States added nothing else, then it might with some plausibility be claimed that some rights were reserved to the State in relation to the qualifications of a member; but the Constitution fixes in well-chosen language the tribunal to decide upon the question of qualification.

Article 1, section 5, says: "Each House shall be the judge of the election returns and the qualifications of its own members." This negatives the idea that any right in relation to the qualifications of a member is reserved to the State. The power to adjudicate is not given to the State, but to each House. Jurisdiction is the right and power to hear and determine a mooted question. The State may prescribe additional qualifications, but it has no power to hear and determine them. It is futile to give to a State the right to make a law but withhold from it the power to enforce it. Suppose Kansas should enact a law that no one but a Republican should be elected to Congress. If any rights to prescribe qualifications of members of Congress are reserved to the State, then the State has the power to pass such a law, but it would be powerless to enforce it.

No State has the right to make a law unless it also has the power to enforce it; it is illogical to say that by implication the framers of the Constitution intended to permit a State to prescribe additional qualifications to those in article 1, section 2, but expressly took from the States the power to enforce such additional qualifications. It would be granting the power to make a law but withholding the power to enforce it. The power to determine the qualifications of a member of Congress was delegated by the people in the Constitution of the United States to the respective Houses of Congress; and each House has exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine this question of qualification. The decision of any other tribunal is not binding because it is an unwarranted assumption of power. If there is no power in a State to enforce a qualification, then the power to make the qualification is useless and of no effect. Concede the power of a State to make qualifications in the premises, and you concede the power to the State to render ineligible every citizen within its borders, and thus by a combination of States destroy the Congress.

Legally, a right and the power to enforce it go together. If there is no power to enforce then there is no right. It is the power to enforce that establishes the right. If the power to enforce the right does not exist, then the right does not exist, As an abstract proposition there can be a law without a penalty, but such a law is dormant, powerless, forceless. Law is a rule of action, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong, prescribed by some supreme power. The idea of command naturally suggests the power to enforce obedience to the command. One person may have the power to command and another the power to enforce; one branch or department of government may have power to make law and another department may execute the law, but they must be co-ordinate departments under one general system. We therefore with great confidence reassert that sovereignty must reside with the power to maintain or enforce, and that as the National Government has the power through its branches of Congress to determine the qualifications of members, therefore the National Government has the power and all of the power to prescribe the qualifications of its members.

Now, I will not say anything further upon the case except to thank the gentlemen who make the majority as well as the minority report for their uniform courtesy to me, and also to thank the Committee on Elections for extending the same uniform courtesy in all that pertains to the present case. After all, Mr. Speaker, the will of the people, let me say in conclusion, is the supreme power in this Government. Expression of that will of the people sent the sitting member here to represent them. That expression of the will of the people is untarnished by fraud or by any informality that can take away its potency. In obedience to that mandate I am here. It remains for this House to say whether the will of the people, thus formally expressed, shall be ignored and its herald and Representative sent from these legislative halls. Confidently believing that my case has been carefully and fairly presented, I submit to the decision of this House the mutual interests of my people and myself.

Mr. BENNETT addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. I do not wish to occupy the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, for a single moment longer than they want to hear me. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. That is a very dangerous statement to make on this floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. I hear no suggestion that I should quit now [laughter], and therefore I am encouraged to go on, and I will do so, giving my friend from North Carolina time to get his wind back again. [Laughter]. In a few words, then, what have we here? A contested-election case between Mr. Wood and Mr. Peters, of Kansas. It is conceded on all hands that Mr. Peters got 16,502 honest majority.

I wish Democrats to hear me, for I am a democrat myself, but perhaps some gentlemen may not believe that. [Cries of "No!"] A democrat is to let the people rule, and I am in favor of the people doing that very thing. Let some Democrat here rise up and deny that proposition.

A MEMBER. You are not that sort.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I say a democrat is one who is in favor of allowing the people to rule. Then what have we here? I concede, and gladly concede, the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress made thereunder are not the supreme law of this land. Then what? Why, then, of course the laws of Kansas must be. Then the State must be supreme. There is no escape from the conclusion. Now, what do we find here? Democrats, you State-rights men, I am talking to you. Here is a State that has given 16,500 majority in favor of the sitting member and against the contestant. Now, I wipe out the United States, I concede that the United States and its Constitution and laws have nothing to do with the subject under discussion. Admit all that; and then what?

Mr. WOLFORD. Now you are coming back to the Republican party. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. And then, I say, what? What is left to you? Why, then the State of Kansas, and nothing else. And now, Democrats, listen a moment longer. Do you know, have you yet discovered, that the word "State" in the Constitution means three things? There is the Territorial State of Kansas. Did the Territorial State of Kansas send Judge Peters here, or send Mr. Wood here? No. What next? Why, then you have the people of Kansas, the men and the women and the children who live there. Well, then you have the political State. Now, I will tell you Democrats something that you have never understood before. When the rebellion came along we Republicans said you can not go out of the Union, and when the war was over were you out or in?

Mr. WOLFORD. Will the gentleman permit me to make a correction? It was the Union men who said you could not go out.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I ask the question, were you out or in? You were in. Well, the soil was in, was it not? The soil of the States was in. The lands were in and the people were in, but were the Democratic confederate State governors in the Union?

Several MEMBERS. They were.

Mr. PETTIBONE. What? Will any Democrat say they were in?

Mr. VANCE. We think that way down in my country.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Do you say that the State of North Carolina was in?

Mr. VANCE. Yes.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I am glad to have it put on the records of this country that the gentleman from North Carolina has stated that the governor of that State, where the governor had sworn that he would not support and defend the Constitution of the United States, but that he would support, protect, and defend the constitution of the Confederate States, was a governor in the Union. Furthermore, your Legislatures—were they in the Union? Every member had sworn that he would support and defend the confederate constitution, but that he would not support and defend the United States Constitution. Were they in the Union? Your judges had sworn that they would support the constitution of the confederacy; were they in the Union? Yet the gentleman says that the State was in the Union.

Why, Mr. Speaker, there was a man once from my own town; his name was Andrew Johnson. Did you ever hear that name, you Democrats?

Mr. COSGROVE. Frequently.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Well, Andrew Johnson said when the war was over that the rebellion had left the State of North Carolina—now listen my friend on my right here who said North Carolina was in the Union—Andrew Johnson said the war had left that State devoid of all civil government. Now, who wrote that opinion for him? William H. Seward. I am talking now to you Democratic lawyers on this side of the House. That was written by William H. Seward.

Mr. COSGROVE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Most assuredly.

Mr. COSGROVE. Was it for that declaration that your party sought to impeach him?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Oh, good Lord! [Great laughter.] Oh, lame and impotent conclusion!

Gentlemen, I want any North Carolina lawyer on this floor to get up here in this House and say that the political State of North Carolina, the political government of North Carolina, the political legislators and political judges of North Carolina were in the Union when the war closed. William H. Seward was just as good a lawyer as you or I. Jeremiah Black, whom you and I know was the adviser of Andrew Johnson, was as good a lawyer as there is on this floor, but Johnson said that the political State of North Carolina was dead.

Now, furthermore, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of White against Texas, has said exactly the same thing. The Supreme Court said it also in Luther against Borden.

Now, what do I mean by all this? Simply this, that while I admit that the Constitution of the United States and the laws made thereunder are the supreme laws of the land, but yet assume that this is not so for argument's sake; I will grant that it is not. Then when you come to Kansas what have you? Let us see. The political state of Kansas does not elect members of Congress here. Who does? Is it not the popular state of Kansas, the democracy, the people. The men, the voters of the state of Kansas, are the ones who do it. I ask you if that is not true?

Now I come back to this report which we have made from the Committee on Elections; and recollect we have nine Democrats and six Republicans on that committee; and eight Democrats and six Republicans say that when the people of Kansas, the people who are the source of power, send a man here he shall be accorded his seat. You Democrats, I want you to listen to me, because I wish to teach you the very fundamental principles of democracy. Evidently you have not learned them yet. [Laughter.] You do not know them. I say to you that the citizens of the United States, the honest voters of this country, the common sense of a large majority of the people, ought to determine, and they will determine, questions of this kind; and I want you to put yourselves on record to the contrary, you apostles of shame-faced democracy, if you will. When, then, the people of Kansas, by a majority of 16,500, have said that Judge Peters shall come here and represent them, and when you have had three cases from that same State of men who were sitting as judges in Kansas who were elected and permitted to hold their seats here, I say and hope, in the Lord's name, that you will turn Peters out and put Wood in. I am done. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state there was a mistake in announcing the time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] had expired. Another gentleman was occupying the chair when the gentleman began his speech. The gentleman from North Carolina had only spoken forty minutes when the Chair announced that his hour had expired.

Mr. HART. I am a member of the Committee on Elections and would be entitled to address the House. I wish to yield to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] whatever time he may require.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Has the gentleman from North Carolina concluded his remarks?

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who wishes to make a statement to the House; and I will for the present reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. A similar case to this originated in the State of Illinois; in fact two cases, which have been cited. One is known as the Trumbull case, which has been already referred to. The most recent case was that in which the present Senator CULLOM was elected a United States Senator by the last General Assembly of the State of Illinois. At the time of his election he was the governor of that State. The constitution of the State of Illinois contains this clause:

> Neither the governor, the lieutenant-governor, auditor of public accounts, secretary of state, superintendent of public instruction, nor attorney-general shall be eligible to any other office during the period for which he shall have been elected.

In the middle of his term as governor the last Legislature of the State of Illinois elected Mr. CULLOM to the United States Senate. That election was not brought about without a contest on the part of the Democratic members constituting the minority of that Legislature: and in that contest they were aided very materially by a very respectable minority of the Republican members of that Legislature.

That minority, represented by the Democratic party, placed upon the records of that general assembly a protest against the election of Governor CULLOM, a solemn protest that the person who had been declared elected by the joint action of the two houses of the Legislature was ineligible under the constitution of the State of Illinois to hold that office.

I understand that that opinion was reached after mature reflection and consultation upon the part of the minority members of that Legislature, and the opinion was shared by a no less distinguished legal authority than ex-Governor John M. Palmer, of that State. Therefore at least in one State of this Union the Democratic members of the Legislature are on record as declaring that such an election as this now before the House was without warrant and was illegal.

It is due, however, to some of those gentlemen and to some of the Republican members of the Legislature who protested against that election to say that they were of the opinion that the clause in the State constitution to which I have referred affected the Legislature only; in other words, that the members of the Legislature were under a moral responsibility to their own constitution, which they had sworn to support, not to elect a man to the office of United States Senator who was by the constitution ineligible to hold the office.

However they may have been divided in that respect, the Democratic minority placed upon the record their protest, and it stands to-day as the voice and sentiment of the Democratic party of the State of Illinois upon a question similar to the one now before this House. For that reason, and because my own mind has been brought to a similar conclusion by a careful investigation of this subject, I shall vote to declare this seat vacant, and ask the people of Kansas to obey their own constitution and to send some one to this body who is qualified under the constitution of Kansas as well as the Constitution of the United States to occupy a seat on this floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (S. 510) for the relief of B. Jennings;

A bill (S. 1544) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to timber depredations;

A bill (S. 1599) to change the designations and title of certain officers of the Medical Department of the Army;

A bill (S. 1988) for the government and control of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal, Michigan; and Joint resolution (S. R. 63) authorizing Augustus J. Cassard to accept a gold medal conferred upon him by the Government of France.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal;

A bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard; and

A bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laurena C. P. Haskins.

ELECTION CONTEST—WOOD VS. PETERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case of S. N. Wood vs. S. R. Peters, of Kansas.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I would inquire of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] if he desires to address the House at this time?

Mr. LOWRY. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], I will say that I think that in the present temper of the House I would not be justified in occupying its attention at this time.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Then I move the previous question on the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections, and the substitute offered therefor by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] on behalf of the minority.

Mr. BENNETT. If in order I would like to ask a division of the vote on the resolutions offered by the minority.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Is it in order to demand a division of a proposition submitted as a substitute?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the substitute contains two distinct propositions, one declaring that the sitting member is not entitled to the seat, and the other declaring that the contestant is entitled to the seat.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. My reason for the inquiry is that the proposition offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] was intended as an entire substitute for the proposition submitted by the majority of the Committee on Elections. According to my limited experience of parliamentary law the vote is first on the entire substitute, and there can be no division of it, as I understand, when it is offered for another proposition. But I defer to the superior judgment of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair concedes that there is some difficulty relating to the application of the rule.

Mr. BENNETT. It was so decided in a former case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did so decide once, but had some doubt whether in that particular case it was a correct decision, inasmuch as in that case there was some question whether there were two separate and distinct propositions. But there is no such difficulty in this case, and the Chair thinks that the division of the question can be demanded.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BENNETT] as a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

Mr. BENNETT. Did the Chair rule that my substitute was not divisible?

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled that it was divisible; that the first and second resolutions embraced in the substitute could be voted upon separately, as each is a complete proposition in itself, not dependent upon the other. The Clerk will read the first division of the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Samuel R. Peters, of Kansas, is ineligible to the seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-eighth Congress now held by him.

The question being taken on agreeing to the first division of the substitute, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 20, noes 106.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the second division of the proposed substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Samuel N. Wood, of Kansas, is entitled to said seat.

The question being taken on the second division of the proposed substitute, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 2—noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That S. R. Peters was duly elected a member of Congress from the State of Kansas, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. BENNETT. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 9 voting in favor thereof.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the amendments of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CALKINS. Before the question is put on this motion, may I be permitted to inquire who it was that made the point of order sending this bill to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. CALKINS. I take the liberty of asking the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw that point and allow the bill to come before the House and be acted on, in accordance with the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations, who have agreed substantially as to the course which the bill should take. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will allow this bill to go to a committee of conference by unanimous consent. I dislike to make the request; but the Committee on Appropriations are agreed upon this matter.

Mr. KASSON. If, on behalf of that committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] can say that they are disposed to consider favorably the Senate amendments, I have no objection to his suggestion. My object is to avoid any possible appearance of unanimity in the House against those amendments of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I can not hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. CALKINS. Of course I am unable to say what the committee of conference may agree upon; I make the request simply because the Committee on Appropriations, the majority and minority of the committee, have marked out a plan by which action may be taken; and it seems desirable not to interfere with that course which has been marked out, as I understand, with the assent of all parties.

The Committee on Appropriations have agreed to allow the amendments of the Senate to be non-concurred in in the House and sent to a committee of conference. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw any objection to the adoption of that course.

Mr. REED. I hope that at some suitable time the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], if that request is concurred in, will give opportunity for proper discussion of the questions involved in some of these amendments, which are deemed important. If the course suggested is desired simply as a method of procedure for the purpose of getting at the matter in a more satisfactory way, I do not suppose anybody on this side will object.

Mr. RANDALL. It has never been my practice to attempt to thwart the wishes of members where they have made reasonable requests as to debate. Of course I have no power to bind any one else than myself. I suppose that upon the report of the conference committee, if that committee should agree as to the entire bill, gentlemen would have the right to discussion; and so far as I am concerned I would not be unwilling that thirty minutes, or such time as may be reasonable under the circumstances, should be allowed for such discussion.

Mr. REED. I do not think it best that there should be now any statement as to the time, because we can only judge as to the reasonableness of any particular time for debate when the occasion presents itself.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to judge of the necessity of that matter at the time when the bill comes back from the conference committee.

Mr. KASSON. In making the point of order I had no other view than to exhibit the position in which the bill is placed by the amendments of the Senate and to indicate the strong feeling existing to some extent on both sides of the House in favor of those amendments. I think we ought to have an assured time for proper debate, whether it be now or after the conference committee shall have reported.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman and I might differ as to what would be "proper debate." I think I have said enough as to what my probable course will be. I do not propose to have any further statement extorted from me.

Mr. KASSON. Then I must say that thirty minutes will not be satisfactory; and I insist on my point.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I ask a vote on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole, and the pending question is the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the amendments be read in order.

The first amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Insert these words: "Which shall specify the special necessity for such travel;" so it will read as follows:

"For two secretaries, one to the Admiral and one to the Vice-Admiral, clerks to paymasters, clerks at inspections, navy-yards, and stations, and extra pay to men enlisted under honorable discharge; commission and interest, transportation of funds, exchange; mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, which shall specify the special necessity for such travel."

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether he wants the amendments read before the general debate has taken place.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to take the negative recommendation of the committee on all of them, or I am willing to except any amendment the gentleman may indicate.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will not state the general purport of the amendments, and the reason for opposing them, I will say briefly for my part what I wish to say.

Mr. RANDALL. I am acting under the directions of the committee. I propose to extend to the other side of the House all the rights they have under the rules. [Cries of "Vote!"] I will indicate to the House what proceeding I mean to take.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the formal reading of the Senate amendments will be waived. I understand the gentleman from Iowa does not insist upon their being read.

Mr. KASSON. I will not if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will state them to the committee; but the committee ought to be advised of what those amendments are.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The amendments have all been printed and are accessible to every member.

Mr. RANDALL. There are twenty amendments which are of importance in this, that they increase the aggregate of appropriations $6,328,980. There is one reduction in the bill of $5,000.

Mr. KASSON. I have asked the chairman of the committee the usual explanation of the question before the House, and have further asked him to make a statement of the reasons for which he asks the House to-day to oppose these Senate amendments. If he desires to leave it on that statement, I will give briefly the reasons why I think the House should support the amendments. I regret that the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not consider it a question of some importance to what object it is proposed to devote these $6,000,000 which the Senate proposes to add to the bill. I regard the object as the fundamental point in the amendments of the Senate. He has contented himself with simply saying that they appropriate more money than the House did. Why have they done it? For what object have they appropriated these additional amounts, and why does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania say something to enlighten the House why we should not concur in it?

Now, sir, in my opinion this question of constructing some additional vessels for our Navy is not surpassed in importance by any measure now pending in the House of Representatives, with one possible exception. It is a question which concerns national defense. It concerns national honor and national safety. In the debate on the bill which occurred the other day, I am glad to say that on both sides of the House gentlemen asserted themselves in favor of further appropriations for the Navy. And my friend from Pennsylvania knows perfectly well that the interest and main interest in these Senate amendments is not in the amount of money appropriated, of which he has chosen to enlighten the House, but it is in the object of that appropriation and the purpose to be accomplished.

Now, these amendments, as I understand them, are to provide for arming the three cruisers which are soon to be completed, and which without the appropriation now made will be as ineffective as so many toy-ships set afloat in the harbors of the country. With great right the Senate have added an appropriation to furnish the guns required by the cruisers now approaching completion. Is there anybody in the House—does the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself profess that these ships will be of any use without armament? If so, is it not a question of proper attention from this House whether those guns should not be made and delivered on board those ships as speedily as possible after their completion? Of what use are these ships without guns? Of what possible service can they be? And yet the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations meets this point, not with a statement as to the necessity or otherwise of the appropriation, but with a simple declaration that the amendment of the Senate increases the amount of the appropriation. That is all.

Then again, sir, these amendments of the Senate propose to continue the rebuilding of our Navy by authorizing the construction of four additional cruisers, as recommended by the naval advisory board, acting under the authority of Congress; and the addition of these four makes a total provision of only seven ships in all for the Navy of the United States, to adapt it to the prosecution of modern warfare and to provide for the defense of our interests upon the high seas. And the gentleman from New York, not now in his seat, I refer to Mr. DORSHEIMER, said rightly the other day that it is simply going in the direction of providing a small, compact, and efficient Navy for the honor and the safety of our common country. Are we to be answered that we shall not be permitted to meet the exigencies of the Government in that direction because it costs some money to provide the ships and to arm them? And yet, sir, that is the simple, bold answer made to my inquiry by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I wish I could persuade this House to remember the time when the Navy of this country was the pride and boast of the whole United States. Prior to this late lamentable and unhappy internal war of ours that Navy was the object of devoted care by all parties and by all sections of this country, and by none more than by the Democratic party of the United States. There never was a banquet held at which public men were present, there never was a popular meeting or assembly at which toasts were offered, where one of the regular standing toasts failed to be "The Army and Navy of the United States." Our children in the schools were taught to read of the brilliant naval victories and achievements, victories which still illuminate the pages of the entire story of our national existence. They were taught to remember as they grew up that in the last great naval war with England our little, compact, but efficient Navy captured over fifty British war vessels with 800 guns and brought them under the dominion of the American flag, and with a loss to our Navy of but 25 ships and 350 guns. We have been raised from childhood (thank God I am old enough to remember that time) to admire, and honor, and love this arm of our national defense.

But what is the condition of sentiment to-day? Now your Iroquois clubs, and your free-trade clubs that used to shout for "free trade and sailor's rights," and all your political clubs meet and dissolve and enjoy the banquet without a word to praise or to commemorate this once brilliant arm of our national strength.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to gentlemen of the other side on this subject because it indicates the decay among politicians and those who consider themselves statesmen of those sentiments of national honor and national glory which underlie to a great extent our national prosperity and always our national safety.

Sir, we have had such a navy as I desire to see again; a navy not too large nor overwhelming in its numbers and power, not for fitting out great squadrons in sea fights, but a navy which can pass quickly from port to port, which can successfully pursue hostile cruisers that would otherwise blockade our ports and shut us off from the commerce of the world in time of war; and which can fight without having to haul down the flag before the like ships of any nation in the world. You admit, gentlemen, that we have not such a navy to-day. You admit that we are in a defenseless condition in that respect as compared with all the great and some of the minor nations of Europe. You admit that the situation demands relief. I ask you, then, why is this not the time to relieve ourselves from that mortifying embarrassment and restore, partially at least, this means of maintaining the honor, the importance, and the safety of our country?

If I made that appeal to you gentlemen when our Treasury was empty, when we were obliged to impose further taxes to accomplish the result, you might shake your heads and say the time is inopportune. But I make the appeal to you when no additional tax need be levied to accomplish it. I make the appeal when the Treasury of the country is overflowing and while you are asking what can we do by our legislative authority to diminish the surplus already accumulated and restore the money to circulation among the people. Am I not right, then, in saying that now, to-day, this hour, is the time, the day, and the hour to proceed with the work of construction?

I speak with more than ordinary feeling, Mr. Chairman, because I know that these national necessities spring upon nations most unexpectedly, and that we are ourselves to-day in a situation which may prove disastrous, that which may result in defeat, dishonor, and humiliation because we have not the means to assert our rights or to defend ourselves.

I speak with confidence because even in the country papers of the far West they are arousing popular opinion to great interesti n this question of a restored navy. I speak with earnestness because we have now at this moment serious questions with more than one foreign government which affect our national interests, and in the far West our exports to the degree of hundreds of millions. I speak also because I know that the arm of your executive Government is partially paralyzed by the consciousness that foreign governments believe it can not back its position with that degree of physical force which every nation in the world now recognizes as a necessary addition to the moral force of national demands.

Sir, if there was time to point the attention of the House to the present operations of other governments, I should but re-enforce the arguments in favor of these appropriations. There is a revival in France of the spirit of foreign acquisition of which we read in nearly every morning's paper, and it is extending to different parts of the world. We are having irritating questions with Great Britain, arising out of her interior difficulties, and they are presenting themselves every month as the history of the times proceeds. We find also that, not content with regulating affairs upon the European and the Eastern continents, foreign aggressions are made and are contemplated against our rights, unanimously asserted, and with intense spirit, in this country in relation to Central and South America. They are not only meditated but have been begun. Foreign influence under the protection of a foreign government has already seized one of those great interocean lines of communication which have been the occasion of international contest and struggle between this country and foreign governments for fifty years. Quietly the work goes on. One is yet left to us; only one—that great natural route by the way of Lake Nicaragua which now has been neglected for two years; neglected by the last Republican Congress, I say it to its shame; neglected by this present Congress so far. That will soon pass from our control and become the property and subject to the domination of alien governments, unless we are prepared to defend with the right hand of physical power our asserted superior right to control that great route.

Wherever I look, sir, to the East or to Central America, I see the progress of measures directly hostile to our interests, directly hostile to our rights, directly in the teeth of the policy which every government we have had for fifty years has asserted to be vital to us. Yet I venture to say here that if we can secure our rights in no other way this House, if I do not mistake its temper, would declare war rather than see the control of the Nicaragua route pass out of the power of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, it is for these and like reasons that I have been unwilling that either our own people or any foreign country should suppose that we were indifferent on this floor to a proposition to increase our means of naval defense to the extent named in these amendments. If we were to show that indifference it would simply be an assurance to those who are contemplating these aggressions that we were indifferent to our own great interests, and that we would not have either the spirit or the power to assert our rights and defend them by force of arms.

I am glad to say, sir, that national views like these have prevented this question from being made a party question in the other branch of Congress. These very amendments come to us indorsed by a large majority, and that majority obtained by the votes of gentlemen who do not belong to the Republican party, and who, thank God, love their country, its honor, and its flag, and are ready to give blood and money for its defense. [Applause.]

I hope that in this House the record may at some proper time show that when it comes to a question of national honor and national safety there is no division on this floor on party lines—that on such a question we know neither North nor South nor East nor West. And I appeal to my friends in the opposition, especially to those from the South—whose help has been given in another place to these amendments—I appeal to them to help us restore that old sentiment of honor and admiration toward our Navy which can not be restored until we put our flag afloat upon the seas on strong ships, with trained and gallant sailors, who are ready to defend it with their guns and their lives.

At some time gentlemen on both sides of the House ought to be allowed to make a record in support of these Senate amendments. But I have no desire, and I wish to assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that I have had no desire to increase his difficulties or to prolong this debate. I do not intend to call for the yeas and nays. I do not know that I shall call for a division. But I do believe that the majority of this House, and I know that the majority of the country desire to put our flag in a condition of safety upon the high seas. They do want a respectable navy. They want our vessels to be furnished with guns when built, and they wish to be exempt from that danger of national humiliation which is ever present to any nation in the world which is not prepared with blood and with physical force to defend its rights and its honor. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] desires to speak.

Mr. REED. I was in hopes that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] would explain to us what these amendments are which he desires us to disagree to.

Mr. RANDALL. I will do so before I ask the committee to rise.

Mr. REED. I should be very glad to hear the gentleman's statement concerning those amendments of the Senate, and so would the House; and possibly after we have heard his explanation there may not be any criticism.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the gentleman does not want now or during this sitting to take up any time in the discussion of those amendments?

Mr. REED. I desire to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania explain to the House the nature of the amendments which he asks us to disagree to.

Mr. RANDALL. The other side has an hour to speak, and the gentleman can take his time now.

Mr. REED. Then the gentleman does not desire his remarks to be criticised.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; I do, fully.

Mr. REED. Then will the gentleman be kind enough to make them now? It may be that his remarks will be beyond criticism.

Mr. RANDALL. No; but I suppose that the minority of the Committee on Appropriations would have criticised me if my action in the committee or out of it had been capable of any construction that warranted criticism. The amendments of the Senate are all printed, are easily understood, and I have no doubt the gentleman himself has read them with care.

Mr. REED. The gentleman does me a great deal of honor in that supposition.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. But I have not read them. The method by which we obtain information in the House is ordinarily by discussion. The suggestion I make to the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that he shall present to us his views on the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. But you would object if after having made this explanation and closed the discussion upon the amendments to this bill I should ask the committee to rise to close debate.

Mr. REED. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania should undertake to close the debate after he had made his statement. But I do think he should now make his statement and allow a reasonable opportunity for reply. If then he sees fit to rejoin, that is the ordinary and proper method of discussion.

I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that while it may be eminently proper for him, having in view simply his own side of the House, to state to them that the Senate amendments involved the appropriation of more money, and end the discussion of them there. Nevertheless ordinary parliamentary courtesy, which sometimes goes beyond the absolute necessities of the case, might indicate that he should condescend to explain to the House at large, just as if he did not know that he had at his back gentlemen who cared nothing about what were in the Senate amendments either one way or the other.

I do not think the gentleman ought to assume that this House is going to be governed entirely by his simple statement that there is more money involved in the Senate amendments. It is possible that if there is more money involved in them there may be reasons for it. At least I hope the gentleman will state to us the reasons why he asks us to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate. Surely that is a reasonable request, especially as he would have an entire right to reply should any gentleman criticise his statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I am always accommodating, and especially as I need not now take any advantage of the position which I hold, for as far as I know the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations in reference to this particular mode of procedure is without any dissent among its members.

I will not now undertake to answer anything that has been said about the paralysis of our Navy, except to say that no one on this side of the House is responsible at all in any respect; nor has any one who is in sympathy with this side of the House been guilty of any neglect in that particular.

When this bill went to the Senate it appropriated $14,334,695.95. It comes back to us appropriating $20,863,675.95; an increase in the aggregate of $6,528,980. The additions are composed in detail of the following items: To the monitors, $2,000,000; to the steel cruisers, $2,500,000.

Let me pause here a moment to say that the provision inserted by the Senate in regard to the steel cruisers is in substance, if not literally, a bill now on the Speaker's table from the Senate in relation to the same subject. It is a remarkable coincidence that the Senate, after ten or twenty years of struggle against incorporating legislation upon appropriation bills, should have seen fit to depart from their position occupied during all that period of time in so significant a manner as this. I will ask the Clerk to read what one of the Senators, the Senator in charge of the bill, stated in the Senate in reference to this matter, as the reason for inserting this bill wholesale into the body of an appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HALE. Then, setting aside the question of order, is this not a reasonable thing for us to do in the relation of the two Houses? I want to remove, if I can, the feeling the Senator has that the Senate is now doing anything that may look like coercing the House. I agree fully with him that that can not be done by either House, but I do think, and I hope he will support me in this, that it is legitimate and fair and not encroaching upon the other House to put on this appropriation bill this amendment, which our rules allow us to do, simply to bring the matter before the other House.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not discuss at this time the merits of the proposition for the construction of these cruisers except to suggest that wisdom dictates we should not enter upon the building of new cruisers on this bill, at least when there is a bill on the same subject pending in the Naval Committee and another bill from the Senate on the Speaker's table. In this remark I waive altogether the question whether the cruisers already authorized and now in course of construction are a complete success.

The next item is $680,000 for ordnance. When the opportunity offers and time permits I am quite ready to discuss very fully in the light of information since derived the question whether the Navy Department is a proper Department to be intrusted with the expenditure of that amount of money.

The next item is $55,000 for the construction or purchase of a torpedo-boat. The next is an increase of $143,000 in the appropriations for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. The next is an increase of $480,000 in the appropriations for the Bureau of Construction and Repair. Then in the Bureau of Steam-Engineering there is a proposed increase of $290,000. There is also an appropriation of $150,000 for the purchase of tools for the navy-yards of the United States in connection with the construction of steel cruisers; and this in the face of the fact that the Secretary of the Navy has authorized the closing of all the eight yards except three.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations in asking the House to dissent en masse from these amendments thought the business of the country would be facilitated by such a course, and that an intelligent and wise conclusion would perhaps be reached through the agency of a conference with the Senate. This is our reason for asking the House to non-concur in these amendments, embracing as they do so large an amount of money.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have so satisfying an explanation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. It is formed upon the model of the explanations which he ordinarily gives to the House—explanations which I can see by previous votes are satisfactory to the House. He states no reason whatever for the conclusions to which he arrives; he simply states to the House that he has arrived at certain conclusions. The first of these is that vessels should not be built by the Navy Department. Now, one would ordinarily suppose that the Navy Department was created for the purpose of building vessels. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania gives us no other reason for not building vessels than, first, that they are liable to be built by the Navy Department, and secondly, that there is a bill for that purpose now on the Speaker's table. Yet he knows that the bill now on the Speaker's table is there not for life, but for death. In other words, he does not want any provision in this bill for building cruisers, because there is another bill of similar purpose on the table which he knows can not pass.

Now, these are broad views for the Congress of the United States to take upon a subject like this. Their soundness the gentleman from Pennsylvania will have the satisfaction of seeing ratified, undoubtedly, by his side of the House; and I suppose that satisfaction is more supreme and serene in his mind than any flight of oratory or any of those explanations which gentlemen in charge of large measures ordinarily vouchsafe to the community whose interests are intrusted to their care. If so, all I can do is to commend him to the satisfaction which is pretty sure to follow. Still the public will very naturally judge of the character of the majority which satisfies itself by such reasons, and will necessarily be charmed at the result of its efforts for reform made a year or two ago; and the whisper of the next Democratic candidate for President as to the generality of reform which is to be distributed over this country will broaden and increase in its incoherence. [Laughter.]

Now, think of a nation of 55,000,000 people without any navy treated to these two reasons why it should not build a navy: first, that the Navy Department would be liable under the amendment of the Senate to build the vessels; and secondly, that there is another bill pending which can not by any possibility pass, and therefore we should not pass this!

Now, just think of it for a moment. Here you are with the responsibilities of the country upon you. The gentleman from Pennsylvania takes a gentle refuge in the past—that home of the Democracy—the place where they live, and from which they never go. He says, "We are not responsible for the paralysis of the Navy; that belongs to the past." To-day the gentleman from Pennsylvania is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. If he is not responsible for the present, who is? I suppose we are! The fact is, as I have had occasion to remark in this House before, when anything has to be done they have to come to us. The gentleman says he is not responsible for the paralysis of the past. Who is responsible for the paralysis of the present? Will he undertake to deny his responsibility for a naval appropriation bill that passed this House with no appropriations for ordnance? Will he undertake to deny that the paralysis which will ensue if these vessels go afloat without a single gun on them is due to him, so far as he is got? Why, sir, what an attempt! Does the Democratic party intend to go before the country and simply disclaim responsibility as to the past, hoping thereby to shirk its responsibility as to the present? Is that the position for a great party enlisted not merely in the interest of reform but "general reform?" [Laughter.]

I do sincerely hope I shall live long enough, for I am promising myself thereby a very long life—I do sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, I shall live long enough to see the gentleman from Pennsylvania and those whom he so thoroughly represents step out of that dead and buried past, and undertake to do something, and not to be everlastingly hiding themselves behind what has already taken place.

While it is true my friend from Pennsylvania is not in every respect the controller of the Democratic party, yet in relation to every matter of appropriation he has the most absolute control. And that is why I address my remarks to him. It is because in his pocket is the whole of this situation.

Why, how many times has he risen in his place in the House here, and without a single statement of reasons, for he never gives reasons, has he carried the opposition to a proper expenditure of the public resources? While it is granted freely that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to be economical in its expenditures, nevertheless the sole object of raising revenue is to buy what the United States want. That is the sole excuse of taxation of any kind—that the nation wants it.

What does my genial friend say?

Mr. MORRISON. You have a good many other excuses, such as protection and the like.

Mr. REED. Ah, always harping upon my daughter. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Illinois wants to reduce the revenues of the Government, and he can not conceive of but one way of doing it, and that is by lowering the tariff of duties. Why has not he, with his broad views of life and duty—and it seldom happens a man has the opportunity to address two Democratic leaders of such distinction on one occasion [laughter and applause]—why does it not happen, with his broad views of life, broader than those of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that in his anxiety to reduce the revenues of the country he has not raised the tariff? Why, that is the way to do it.

Mr. MORRISON. That is your way.

Mr. REED. And the Democratic constitutional lawyers of this country would have another opportunity for another hundred years to discuss the constitutionality of what Washington, and Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson performed without the slightest doubt either of its constitutionality or its propriety. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

But I am wandering from my main subject. [Laughter.] I address myself to the gentleman from Pennsylvania because his associates accept his opinion, and it is a high tribute under the circumstances.

Mr. RANDALL. And some of yours.

Mr. REED. And some of them accept some of mine. Those gentlemen on the other side who deserve it ought to be proud of the high compliment just paid them so unconsciously by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I wish to appeal to you as a party; you can not any longer go before this country with this talk of non-responsibility. Why are you not men enough to take some responsibility? Why are you not men enough to do what you know this country wants? Why are you not men enough to give us the beginning of a Navy?

Oh, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, we will never have any war; hereafter it is to be all peace, and the Representative of the Quaker city undoubtedly believes in that. The history of mankind is to the contrary, and it shows that no wise nation with surplus revenue ever before presented the defenseless spectacle which this country presents. I summon you, then, gentlemen, to the duties which were intrusted to you, and the responsibility of non-fulfilment of which will be upon you. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDALL took the floor.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to make a statement for the benefit of this side of the House especially, and in justification of the Committee on Appropriations. It was determined by that committee, as has been said by the chairman, to non-concur in all of these amendments and let them go to a committee of conference. Not for the reason the minority of that committee was not in favor of the amendments, but for the purpose of facilitating, if possible, the passage of the bill in some way that the Navy of the country might be benefited. We claimed, and we believe it now, the better way was non-concurrence in these amendments, so as to let them go to a committee of conference, where they can be better reached and discussed. It is known to all parliamentarians on the floor, and I believe it was so decided by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when he was Speaker, that a motion at any time to recede from non-concurrence brings up the particular amendment for discussion. And hence we agreed to allow this to be non-concurred in so that the matter might be facilitated and the bill passed. I hope now that the amendments may be read through and that non-concurrence will be had in them, and the action take place as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on behalf of the committee, and that the bill be disposed of immediately.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER].

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to say that I think some of these amendments of the Senate, which it is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to reject, should be concurred in by this House. I will refer in the first place to the amendment which provides for the purchase of the armament for the four new cruisers now in course of construction. Since this subject was before the House last, one of these vessels has been launched and the other three will be in the water before this House meets in its session in December next.

There is at present, notwithstanding the doubt and confusion which was thrown upon the subject when the appropriation bill was before the committee—there is now no doubt whatever that no money is actually available under the law which can be appropriated for the armament of these ships, and we are placed in the extraordinary position which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations said he wished to avoid, of building four vessels and making no provision for the armament they were designed to carry. In my judgment this House should withdraw from the untenable position in which it has been placed; not only because it is a wise policy to withdraw from that position, but because the plainest dictates of patriotism require that we should withdraw.

We are building four vessels, the first of a class or type designed to be built for this Government under the plans which we have adopted and under the policy of rehabilitating the Navy of this country and putting it on a proper footing; and I wish to ask if there is anybody here who pretends that any party can stand in the face of the people of this country which opposes the rehabilitation of the Navy?

Mr. Chairman, I am not asking for a great navy. I am not asking for such a navy as France has, nor would I expect that this Government should maintain such a navy as England possesses, or even such a navy as Germany has. But I would like to see a navy at least such as that belonging to Portugal or Denmark. I would ask nothing more at this time. But are we to be denied even that?

I would like to see our Navy in such a condition that the great cities of our seaboard, the city where I live and the city where the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations lives, may not be, as they now are, directly at the mercy of any of the third-class powers of the world with whom we might come in conflict. But as to whether these cities are in that condition of defenselessness now, and are at the mercy of foreign governments, if they are willing to take information upon the subject, I refer gentlemen to the General of the Army and to the Admiral of the Navy for their opinion.

Then, sir, I say further, that the House should go on, that the country and the party require that the House should go on and order the additional vessels; and that if we do not act, and act immediately, we will meet the severe judgment of the country at large for our failure. If we fail in this respect to meet the wishes of the people of this country we will subject ourselves especially to the condemnation of our own home constituencies who are bound up in the glory and in the honor of the Navy, associated with its past as no other party in this country has ever been.

But, sir, they tell us we must wait. They tell us we must determine whether the four ships which we have begun to construct will succeed. They tell us that it is an experiment. Has it come to this? Have we come to that position that a nation, which at one time could dispute the possession of the seas with the most powerful of the nations of the earth, must wait to see whether one ship will float before we undertake to build another! Time was, Mr. Chairman, when it was not necessary for even the average intelligent American to wait in order to make up his mind whether the lines and the form and the rigging of the vessel were suited for service upon the seas [applause on the Republican side], and I am amazed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time yielded to the gentlemen from New York has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I want to say that I am not willing, in view of the fact——

Mr. DORSHEIMER. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I wish to interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ask how much time he yielded to me.

Mr. RANDALL. I yielded five minutes.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I understood that I was to have ten.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman misunderstood. I made no such promise. The gentleman from New York asked for fifteen minutes, and then ten minutes. I stated to him that the time I would yield to him depended upon the time occupied by gentlemen upon the other side, and also upon reaching 5 o'clock, so that I might move that the committee should rise before that time.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I understood differently.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will not undertake to say that I gave him an absolute promise.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I certainly so understood.

Mr. RANDALL. You did not so understand.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. Then, when it comes to that, I say that I did.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that you did not.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. And I put my words against yours in the presence of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I say this, that when the gentleman took the floor I said to the Chair that I yielded to him five minutes.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. That I did not hear.

Mr. RANDALL. All around me know that is the fact.

Mr. DORSHEIMER. That I did not hear; but when I left the gentleman he gave me the assurance that I should have ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. HENLEY. I heard the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], and it was exactly as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has averred it to be.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KASSON. I took the floor having a right to it for one hour, and I yielded to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. When the gentleman from Maine got through the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] spoke—still, as I supposed, in my time.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no.

Mr. KASSON. I claim this hour.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Iowa yielded the floor.

Mr. KASSON. If the Chair considers that I am still entitled to the floor, I desire to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Iowa to yield the floor, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania resumed it.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 116, noes 41.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill and the amendments of the Senate thereto, had reached no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and pending that motion I move that when it does so all debate on the amendments of the Senate shall close in one minute.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say that under the circumstances the gentleman ought to allow a few minutes, and let the gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] conclude his remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the gentleman from New York is asking anything from me.

Mr. KASSON. I make the point of order that the time has come to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The time has not quite arrived.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania decline to accept my suggestion?

Mr. RANDALL. My motion is pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that motion he moves that all debate on the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill close in one minute.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend by making the time twenty minutes.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will see we will exhaust the time in a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not my fault.

Mr. CALKINS. Let us have the recess now without further difficulty.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question on my motion.

Mr. KASSON. And on my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is pending.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question on both.

The affirmative vote was taken on ordering the previous question; and there were—ayes 90. Before the Speaker began to count the negative vote,

Mr. CALKINS said: I make the point of order that the time for the recess, 5 o'clock, has now arrived.

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing. The Chair thinks the vote should be completed.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not abandon the point of order, and I desire the ruling of the Chair upon it. My point is that even when the House is dividing, when the hour arrives at which, under an order of the House, a recess should be taken, that breaks the order of business, and the prior order should be executed.

The SPEAKER. This presents of course a different question from that which is presented when a roll-call is proceeding at the hour fixed for a recess. It is a question which has never been decided. The Chair is inclined to think that under the order of the House he is obliged to declare the House in recess. The call for the previous question is pending.

Mr. RANDALL. When does it come up again?

The SPEAKER. It comes up as unfinished business to-morrow after the morning hour. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will preside as Speaker pro tempore during the evening session. The House is now in recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. ADAMS, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House being now in Committee of the Whole, the order of business for this evening, under the resolution adopted by the House, is debate only on the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. YAPLE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to a protective tariff, because it protects the wrong man. It is an obstacle in the path of natural progress. It is a process of transferring wealth from the pockets of one man into the pockets of another without returning any equivalent, and that is robbery. It breeds antagonisms of interests and engenders a war of classes. It builds up monopolies, and every monopoly is an infringement of some right of industry. It is the folly of trying to get rich by increasing the cost of living, of trying to encourage industry by burdening it with taxes, of trying to build up commerce by prohibiting trade.

What is a tariff? It is simply a tax on the exchange of goods. For whatever purpose imposed, whether for the sake of protection, so called, or for revenue only, it is always and simply a tax which the Government levies on goods brought to our shores from other countries. Exchange is the source of all life and wealth. The value of every day's work is its value in exchange. Exchange is a benefit to all parties concerned. Protection, however, denies this fundamental fact of political economy, and affirms that commerce is not a mutual benefit but a swindle; that in every trade one side or the other must lose.

The protective tariff party in this country has by the voice of its orators declared that it would be better if the shores of this nation were surrounded by oceans of fire instead of water; that the Almighty, who is a free-trader, made an economic blunder in connecting England and America by a great highway of commerce. The protective policy is to-day advocated by one party in this country as the permanent, settled policy of the nation. Now, the perfection of protection is prohibition. Its object, then, can not be to secure a revenue to the Government, because without commerce there would be no source of revenue. Revenue is derived on the foreign goods that come to our shores. Protection is secured only as foreign goods are kept out. Protection, therefore, begins just where revenue ends.

The Government gains only as it secures a revenue; now the question is, who gains by protection? Somebody gains something, but not the Government. It is legislation in the interest of particular classes, and class legislation has ever been a blighting curse upon human society, the greatest obstacle to the growth and prosperity of the common people. It is wrong in principle, and what is wrong in principle can not be right in practice.

It is claimed for this protective policy that in the end it secures industrial autonomy and commercial independence; that it develops and multiplies home industries by compelling the nation to produce everything it wants within its own borders. That is the philosophy of compelling every man to produce everything he wants and thus make him commercially independent. "Independence of commerce is the independence of the savage." The richest nation is really the most independent nation, because it is the better able to command the fruits of the soil and the products of the industries of other lands, and riches are the fruit of free thought, free labor, and free trade. [Applause.]

Freedom is a necessary condition of wealth and independence. To blockade commerce is to cut off one of the greatest sources of wealth and means of support. Trade is simply trade, whether between nations or individual men. In a certain sense there is no such thing as trade between nations; it is all trade between individual men. Foreign commerce rests upon precisely the same grounds as domestic commerce. There is just the same reason for the one as for the other. All commerce rests upon the inequalities existing among men and nations.

There is endless variety in nature; diversity of zones, soils, climate, geographical position, and natural productions, and it is on this diversity that international commerce depends, the same as domestic commerce depends on the diversity of tastes, habits, and aptitudes among men. Nature rebukes the doctfine that one nation should be independent of commerce with other nations. In the configuration of the continents God has made the different nations of the earth mutually dependent, and it is just as good political economy to compel each man to produce everything he wants, as to compel each nation to produce everything it wants.

This country is nothing if not commercial. Restrict our commerce and you smite to that extent the soil with blight and chain the wheels of progress. The channels of commerce are the outlets for the fruits of our labor and genius, and the means of securing for our own benefit the arts, literature, science, and natural productions of other lands. Deprive a man of the benefits of commerce with other men and you convert his life into a barren desert. Deprive this nation of the benefits of commerce with other nations and you stop the flying train and sailing ship, close the doors of our factories, put out the fires in our furnaces, and cover with weeds our opulent fields. A protective tariff is simply an act of Congress to amend an act of the Almighty. [Applause.] It does not and can not augment the industries of a country.

A tax has no productive power; it is not a means of development; it is not a source of wealth. It always takes something, but never gives anything. The natural and practical effect of a protective tariff is to redistribute the rewards of industry, prevent the natural diffusion of wealth among those who create it, and center it in fewer hands. It is a tax on the whole people for the benefit of a few. To impose a tariff on a foreign-made article is to increase the price of it, and if the tariff be at all protective, it raises the price of it to a height sufficient to make it dearer than the home-made article or to exclude it from the home market altogether. The home commodity, which was naturally of higher price, is thus by the intervention of law made the cheaper of the two, and in consequence commands the home market. The home manufacturer is thus given a complete monopoly of the home market.

Who pays this duty, or the excess in price of the domestic above that of the foreign article? We say the home buyer—that is, the people of the country which imposes the tariff. Who gains this excess? The home manufacturer. The protectionist claims that the duty is paid by the seller, not the buyer, and is in fact a tax on foreign industry. In 1880 we imported pig-iron to the value of $11,619,000 on which the customs duties amounted to $4,318,000, equivalent to a duty of 36½ per cent. ad valorem. Who paid that duty of $4,318,000? If the foreign seller paid it, then for every one hundred dollars' worth of pig-iron he received only $63.50.

The world is one vast field of industry. Each nation is a market, for whose trade every other nation is striving. The pressure of universal competition reduces the prices of the products of other countries to a point so low that a further reduction of profits by the payment of duties to us would induce them to withdraw their trade rather than continue it with us. Gain is the only inducement to trade. Is it reasonable to suppose that England, or any nation, would continue to send products to our market unless the prices ruling here were sufficiently high to cover the cost of production there, the cost of transportation, the duty imposed, and leave a margin of profit? England sends her products here to make profits, not losses. Prices rule high here in consequence of the tariff.

The effect of the tariff is to prevent the consumer from purchasing at lower prices than the prices fixed by the home manufacturer. It prevents foreign competition from reducing prices at home, and thus enables the home manufacturers by combinations to maintain prices at a high standard. It makes possible the system of confederated monopolies which to-day crushes out home competition, and curses as with blight the whole land. Suppose that England should impose an import duty of 5 cents a bushel on wheat, would the price of wheat fall 5 cents a bushel in the United States? Would the American, shipping wheat to England, pay that duty, so that the price of wheat to the English consumer would be no more in consequence of it?

If it be true that the imposition of a duty on articles imported from England makes no difference to the American consumer, then the converse of this proposition must also be true, that removing the duty would make no difference to him. Or if it be true, as is now claimed, that the effect of a protective tariff is to decrease prices of home commodities, then the converse of this proposition must also be true, that the effect of removing the tariff would be to increase prices of home commodities. Is it possible to tax foreign industry? If so, every consideration of economy and patriotism should prompt us to raise the entire revenue of the country in that way, and lift every burden from the shoulders of American labor. If that is possible, I would be most heartily in favor of it. Why not in that way compel England and France and other nations to pay our debt? It is a cruel despotism that refuses such a relief to our labor, especially when its costs nothing.

But, Mr. Chairman, a tariff from its very nature does affect prices, does increase prices, and we have a confession of this fact in the records of Congress from the protectionists themselves. In 1872 a bill was passed which exempted from duty for the period of one year all building material except lumber for the benefit of the citizens of the city of Chicago, which in the fall of 1871 was laid in ashes by the great fire. How was Chicago benefited by that act? It furnished to her citizens for a time a cheaper market in which to buy the material, except lumber, for rebuilding the city. It was an act designed for the relief of the Chicago buyer, not the foreign seller; but if tariff taxes are paid by the seller all the benefits resulting from a remission of those duties flowed into the pockets of the foreign seller. This was probably the view which the lumber lords of Michigan and Wisconsin took of the matter, and so, with their great, warm hearts overflowing with the milk of human kindness, they came to Washington and at great cost and effort to themselves succeeded in depriving the foreign seller of any benefits from a repeal of the duty on lumber! [Applause.]

That act is a public confession that tariff taxes increase prices to the consumer and that duties are paid by the buyer. Now the working classes are the greatest buyers and largest consumers in any nation, and the burdens of this tariff system fall heaviest upon them. It increases the cost of everything they have to buy, and thus reduces the purchasing power of their labor.

It is frequently said that the workingmen of this country pay no taxes; that the rich men, the men whose wealth is evidenced by non-taxable greenbacks, national-bank notes, and Government bonds, support the Government. It would be nearer the truth to say that the Government supports the rich on protection pap, and that the workingmen support both the Government and the rich. The industry of this country pays all its taxes and debts of every kind and nature.

To say that the workingmen pay no taxes is simply to say that they have nothing to eat, nothing to wear, and no homes to live in. Labor pay no taxes? What does labor have to buy that is not taxed? There is a tax on almost everything that is raiment, shelter, or implement of toil. Who pays the tax of 2½ cents per pound on the blacksmith's hammers and of 4 cents per pound on horseshoe-nails? Who pays the tax of nearly 50 per cent. on salt? Who pays the tax on lumber, on iron, on woolen goods, on paper, on books, on all the means of living, of education, and of grace (for even the Holy Bible is taxed)? Has the great "God-and-morality" party utterly abandoned missionary work, that it refuses even a free Bible? These taxes are paid by the buyer, and the working classes are the largest buyers in any nation. They consume the largest amount of the necessaries of life, and the taxes on necessaries are higher in proportion than the taxes on luxuries. Mahogany, rosewood, and satinwood, unmanufactured, are exempt from duty. Pine, unmanufactured, the material out of which the homes of labor are built, is taxed $2 per thousand feet. Matches are taxed 35 per cent. ad valorem; precious stones, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Woolen blankets are made dear to the suffering poor; cosmetics are made cheap for the false faces of a useless and shoddy aristocracy.

One has only to read our infamous tariff laws to see how at every point the burdens of taxation fall heaviest upon the consumers of the necessaries of life. The manufacturer in the end pays no part of these taxes, not even on the raw material which he uses. His taxes do not come out of his income. They are put as an increased price on his commodities, and whoever buys his goods pays his taxes. The importer, the jobber, the retailer, all add their taxes to the selling price of their goods, and the buyer pays the whole shot.

Now, the protection that does not protect the consumer is a cheat and a fraud. But the protectionist asks, "If protection tends to increase the price of protected goods, how do you account for the fact that during the twenty years of our protective policy the average of prices in this country has cheapened?" He says: "We have had a protective tariff and the average of prices has cheapened; therefore the tariff has caused lower prices." It might be answered that England has had free trade, and that the average of prices in that country has cheapened, and that therefore free trade has caused lower prices there. There is no relation whatever of cause and effect between the tariff and lower prices. That which in its very nature tends to increase prices can not at the same time tend to decrease them.

Art and science and inventive genius have been at work blessing and enriching the world, while most legislation has cursed it. Art and science are democratic and work for the good of all mankind. Art and science are builders of democracies, the grandest temples beneath the skies. [Applause.] What we owe to material progress, which has showered its blessings upon the whole earth and tended to bring about political and social equality among men, the protectionist claims for his tariff policy. He forgets the beneficent law, enacted by the Almighty, that underlies all production: that in a natural, normal development of human society labor tends constantly to rise in value, and capital and the products of labor tend as constantly to decline in value; that the products of the farm tend to increase in value relatively to the products of the factory, and labor to increase in value over all.

Every reaper and mower, every useful invention tends to increase the purchasing power of labor and cheapen all the products of labor. The natural effect of every useful invention is, first, to increase the productive power of labor; second, to cheapen the cost of production; and, third, to increase the facilities for exchanging the products of labor. Art and science have been at work cheapening the cost of production, manufacturing, and transportation, and cheapening the cost of living to all classes. They have brought us many blessings during the last twenty years—the richest in the world's history—in spite of the hostility of Congress. [Applause.]

Our protective tariff has been an obstacle to cheaper production and manufacturing, and has thereby increased the cost of living and reduced the purchasing power of labor. Prices in this country would be still cheaper if the work of the inventor was supplemented with the work of a better political economy. Robert Fulton, before whose statue in yonder hall I have stood in silent admiration for hours, did more for the freedom of trade, for the emancipation of commerce from the slavery of protection, than all the acts of Congress from the beginning of this Government to the 23d day of April, A. D. 1884. [Applause.]

But it is claimed that to do away with our protective policy would bring our own labor in competition with the pauper labor of Europe, and reduce our labor to starvation wages, or force it out of employment altogether; that free trade means the employment of foreign labor and the discharge of our own. This is only another form of the old argument that commerce is a swindle.

Sir, we are a commercial nation, and a commercial nation as such does not and can not employ foreign labor. What do we do in commerce? We simply exchange the products of our labor for the products of foreign labor. We can not buy unless we sell; we can not sell unless we produce something to sell. Our own labor is our purchasing power, and the more we buy the more it must be employed to produce something to pay for what we buy. The way to stimulate and multiply industries at home is not by restricting or destroying commerce, but by extending its lines in all directions around the circle of the earth. Commerce secures to our labor the benefits of the best skill and highest art of other countries, and brings it into competition with the best—not the poorest—thought and labor of the world. The way to starve labor is to force it to sell in the cheapest, a free market, and buy in a restricted, the dearest market. Commerce of ideas brings mental wealth. Commerce of physical labor brings material wealth.

The question of highest concern to the laborer is how he can get the largest returns for his work. It is not more sweat, but more food, better clothes, and better homes that labor wants. Labor is the builder and supporter of the state, and the greatest problem for the state should be how to increase the purchasing power of labor. Labor is the nation's right arm of power and of glory, and whatever paralyzes its arm or deprives it of strength or reduces its purchasing power is a blow at the nation's life.

Mr. Chairman, why prohibit the importation of the products of foreign labor and yet allow the foreign laborer to come here duty free? Why let him come by the thousands and millions to compete with our labor on our own soil, and lower its wages in every field and factory and mine, and yet deprive our labor of the benefits of cheaper living and lower prices, which would result from opening to it the markets of the world? The labor of this country has no protection, even under our protective tariff, against the competition of the cheap pauper labor of all the world. It must meet that at the very threshold of its own home. The tariff protects home commodities, but not home men. Which is of the greatest value to the State, pig-iron or man? What labor wants is a protection against the iron-fingered, vulture-hearted monoply of the home manufacturer. What labor wants is a competition that reduces the cost of living, not a combination that reduces wages. We have free trade in labor, and now let us have competition in woolen blankets and the necessaries of life.

One of the greatest benefits claimed for the protective policy is that it appreciate the wages of labor in the protected country, but just the opposite of this is the fact. I believe it is agreed among all political economists, and affirmed by all experience, that wages depend upon the productiveness of labor, upon the wage fund, or the amount of capital available for the employment of labor, and upon the amount of labor in the market. Now if protection increases wages, it must either increase the productive power of labor, the fund out of which it is paid—that is, the capital of the country—or reduce the number of laborers competing for work.

A tariff, I repeat, is a tax, and a tax can not be a productive force; it can not increase the supply of capital or diminish the supply of labor. If you can increase the capital of this country by any system of taxes, I say pile the taxes on. I am willing to be made richer that way even. If wealth is the product of law, then what need is there of work? Why not exempt labor from taxation? A protective tariff was never designed to increase the wages of labor. With our scarce population, with our abundance of cheap lands and raw material, the wages of labor were always high in this country.

The manufacturers said they could not compete with foreign countries and pay the high wages of labor here. They must have a dearer market for their goods, and the protective-tariff system was inaugurated to protect our manufacturers against the high wages of labor in our own country. They paid their labor with the products of their factories. The higher the wages of labor, the more of their products it required to pay for a day's work. To increase the prices of their products was to increase their paying power, to buy more labor with a yard of cloth, or, in other words, to reduce the purchasing power of a day's work. The value of a day's work is determined not by the greenback, silver, or gold dollar which it receives in payment—that is a mere incident—but by its purchasing power, what it will buy of the necessaries and comforts of life.

The protective policy is the policy of wrapping up more days' work in a woolen blanket, not of putting more blankets into a day's work. It works just the wrong way. The manufacturers say now just what they said in the beginning, that labor is cheap in England and high in the United States from natural causes, and we must neutralize the effect of high wages here by increasing the paying power of the products of our factories—wrapping up more labor in a woolen blanket. I am glad that the wages of labor are high in this country, and I wish they were higher, as they ought to be. I am opposed to any system that neutralizes the effects of high wages and lowers the compensation of the American laborer. I want to see this Government legislate just a little in the interest of the men who work and support it, and not altogether in the interest of unproductive capital. Protection protects the capital employed in the protected industries, but leaves the laborer exposed to every danger. It is capital's gain and labor's loss.

If protection increases wages, then wages should be higher in Germany than in England. Dear land and pressure of population are the conditions of both countries, and Germany is protected by tariff laws. Yet labor in England has nearly double the purchasing power of labor in Germany.

Protection asks an exclusive market for certain commodities. What does that mean? It means to narrow the markets to the toilers in the field and factory and mine, and thus lower the profits of their labor. The farmer living near Detroit may be able to obtain more of the articles of living and implements of husbandry for his wheat and corn just across the line in Canada than he can in his own city, but the Government compels him to pay a penalty for doing so, and thus reduces the purchasing power of his wheat and corn. The Government makes it unprofitable for him to trade in Canada and forces him to buy at home at prices fixed by the home manufacturer. The wheat he sells, however, must meet in competition rival wheat from all the nations in the open markets of the world.

The farmer enjoys all the benefits of competition when he has anything to sell, but when he wants to buy competition is strangled by law. If Liverpool fixes the price of every bushel of wheat he sells, why should not Liverpool fix the price of his clothes, building material, farm machinery—of what he buys? Protection promised the farmer a home market and increased prices for his products, but it has not furnished either. When it made that promise it probably meant the manufacturer. A market is made up of consumers who have something to buy with. Protection cannot increase the number of consumers, but it can and does decrease consumption by stealing from labor its means of buying. Every farmer knows that the home market has not kept pace with the productions of the soil, and that the prices of his products are fixed in foreign markets.

All improvements in the processes of production, manufacturing, and transportation should yield continually increasing harvests of wealth to the farmer; raise the price of things at their place in production more nearly to the price of things at their place in consumption; enable him to buy a larger quantity of flour with his bushel of wheat, and with a pound of wool to purchase a greater quantity of cloth manufactured from it. Under the operation of natural laws the pound of wool (raw material) increases in value relatively to the cloth (finished product) made from it. Under the operation of our protective tariff it declines in value. The race after cheapness, which the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], with his usual elegance, characterizes as "nasty," is the struggle of man for comfort, enjoyment, wealth, and better civilization. To cheapen products, to bring increased comforts and better living to labor, and thus increase its rewards, is the triumph of science, and I trust will be the glory of Democratic legislation. [Applause.]

I voted against the restoration of the old tariff on wool because I am opposed to increasing the tariff on any article. Whatever inequalities there may be under our present law between the tariff on the raw material and on the manufactured article I would equalize by a further reduction of the tariff on the manufactured article. Instead of increasing the tariff on wool, decrease it on woolen goods. To compel the farm to pay tribute to the factory is an industrial and political abomination. Protection further diminishes the profits of the farmer by increasing the cost of transporting his products from the field to the market.

It is estimated that the cost of the construction of railroads in this country has been increased by the tariff on lumber, iron, steel, and other material used in their construction $3,000 per mile. Does this increased cost come out of the pockets of the railroad companies? Not at all. They get it back from the people in increased freight and passenger charges. The farmers of this country have paid a tribute of nearly 10 cents on every bushel of wheat exported during the last twenty years in increased transportation charges caused by this tariff system. The transportation companies shift the burdens of taxation onto the farm, and when you reach the farm you reach bottom.

The only way the farmer can get rid of taxes is to pay them. He can prey upon nobody and is therefore preyed upon by everybody. The farmer plows his field with a protected plow, sows his wheat with a protected drill, harvests and thrashes it with protected reapers and thrashers, hauls it to the railroad in a protected wagon, loads it into a protected car, and sends it over protected rails to an unprotected market. When he comes to count his returns he finds that it has cost him about two bushels of wheat to get one to market. He works his own land on shares, keeping one-third himself, and giving two-thirds to support the patriotic policy of protection to home industries. [Applause.]

Protection is an obstacle to cheap transportation. Every swamp is a protectionist. Every sand-bar in our rivers is a protectionist. Every corduroy road in our woods is a protectionist. We spend millions of dollars annually to remove obstructions to navigation in our rivers and harbors. Every dollar is invested in the interest of cheaper transportation and freer trade. We bridge rivers and tunnel mountains; we girdle the earth with lines of railroads and steamships to facilitate exchanges. Every locomotive and steamboat is a free-trader. What is the object of all this expenditure of labor and money—of these inventions to sail the waters and fly over the land? Lower freights, and consequently cheaper prices of goods.

But what is gained, if when we exchange our productions for the products of other lands and bring them home the Government builds across our pathway the sand-bar of a protective tariff which we must first remove by the payment of duties. A protective tariff is simply a sand-bar in the channels of commerce, and its removal would let in blessings to every home of labor and not cost the Government a penny.

Another reason given by all industries which ask for protection why they should have it is that they can not live without it. That is an admission that they are not naturally productive. An unproductive industry is an unprofitable one. The labor and capital employed in it yield no benefits. The aggregate of wealth produced in the country is to that extent diminished and an injury done the whole people. If a man's business does not pay, the only privilege the Government ought to give him is the simple privilege of changing his business. If the farmer meets with reverses and losses he must stand it. He is obliged to protect himself by his industry and intelligence.

If one of these protected interests meets with a reverse of fortune it at once appeals to the Government for more protection. To grant it is to tax the whole people for the benefit of private individuals. This, however, the protectionist denies. He says that to maintain it at any cost, or by any means, is a public benefit; that the compensations are furnished in the diversity of industries created; that without a protective policy our people would cease manufacturing and become wholly an agricultural people. A tariff is necessary, therefore, to compel the people to engage in different kinds of work. Now, a factory is no more the product of law than a store is. Manufacturing is just as natural to man as agriculture and commerce.

Diversity of industries springs from diversity of talents, aptitudes, and circumstances. It comes of itself in the natural order of social and national development. The Almighty made provision for it in the constitution of man. Tariff laws can not create diversity of industries unless they have power to create diversity of talents. A factory is the fruit of man's capacity and comes in answer to his wants. Law may by conferring upon some particular industry artificial privileges induce a greater amount of labor and capital to engage in it, but that, instead of creating, prevents a natural diversification of industries. That is precisely the effect of a protective tariff.

One of the greatest of statesmen and political economists, Hon. S. S. Cox, says "capital is more widely diffused, intelligence is more general, the people higher in the scale of life where there is a multitude of small industries;" but the effect of a protective tariff is to draw labor and capital, for labor always follows capital, away from the numerous smaller industries and create in both a tendency to a few great ones. Its tendency is to centralization, and centralization tends to unity, not diversity. We must have agriculture and commerce as well as manufactures. Laws which discriminate in favor of either and against the others are injurious to the country. When the protectionist says we must build up our manufactures, I answer, not only that, but we must build up agriculture and commerce. The permanent success of manufactures necessarily depends on profitable farms and increasing commerce. The industries of the country are correlative, and the permanent success of each is to be found only in the success of all. A nation prospers when every class unites for common interests and common rights.

Another reason continually urged during the last few years for maintaining our tariff system is that it is necessary in order to raise the revenue to pay off the debt entailed upon us by the war. The object of protection, however, is not to raise revenue. Its object is to secure to the home manufacturer an exclusive market for his goods. Revenue is derived on the goods imported; protection is secured only by restricting importations. In so far as a tariff is protective it prevents revenue. It is simply a tribute levied upon all the labor of the country for the benefit of some particular interests, and if all the money that has been paid by the people to the manufacturers under this system, aptly called the brigandage of a class, had been paid to the Government the national debt could have been wiped out long ago; that is, unless it had been perpetuated in the interests of the national banks and other monopolies. The philosophy of helping labor pay its debts by stealing its earnings, of raising revenue by stopping trade—that is protection.

Another argument constantly recurring in the writings and speeches of the advocates of protection is that it equalizes the unequal conditions of labor in this and foreign countries, and thus places our labor on an equal footing with foreign labor. Can this difference be equalized by a protective tariff? To do this the tariff must have the effect of making labor dearer in foreign countries or of making it cheaper here. Do our tariff laws have the effect to increase the wages of labor in England? In what way is it possible for us by any kind of tariff system to make labor dearer in England? Who asks for protection to increase the wages of foreign labor? It is asked in the interest of American, not of foreign labor. How, then, can we equalize the difference, which all admit is a difference in wages, between labor in the United States and England? We can do so only by cheapening American labor. How can we do that? Ah, we have already learned how. By means of a protective tariff equalize the conditions of sale between the two countries, make it impossible for the labor of this country to buy in the cheaper markets of foreign countries, enhance the cost of its living, and reduce its purchasing power.

Our tariff system is absolutely powerless to change or affect the conditions of production in foreign countries. It can not change the climate of England; it can not impoverish her soil; it can not increase the number of her births or decrease the number of her deaths; it can not limit her fields of coal or mines of iron; it can not destroy the energy or the genius of her people; it can not make them more ignorant or less efficient in work. All these conditions remain the same whether we have a tariff or not. It can not change our own climate; it can not augment our natural resources; it can not make us wiser or more fruitful in inventions. All the conditions of production here remain the same whether we have a tariff or not. The only thing it can do is to change the conditions of sale. It affects prices, and always to the detriment of our own labor. I wish I had power to illustrate the thought like the clear and pellucid Bastiat, or like that wonderful word-painter, the author of "Free Land and Free Trade." Mine, however, is no artist's work.

Suppose that Pennsylvania was the only State in the Union—and she thinks she is, but will find out that she is not—and suppose that Pennsylvania speculators should conclude to devote themselves to fig culture. They know that the Almighty has so arranged things that figs can not be raised in Pennsylvania for less than $10 apiece. They accordingly demand, and as a matter of course get, a duty of 999 cents imposed upon foreign figs. With the help of this duty these Pennsylvania speculators say that the conditions of fig culture are now equalized between Pennsylvania and foreign countries. But every man of sense knows that the conditions of fig culture in Pennsylvania and in other climates are just the same, and that it is only the price of figs in Pennsylvania that is changed. Every man knows that, in that case, if he buys an imported fig he pays the Government $9.99 for the privilege, and that if he buys a Pennsylvania fig the increased price which he pays in consequence of the tariff goes into the pockets of the Pennsylvania fig-raiser. He knows that if he buys a genuine native fig he must pay a large amount of extra labor for it, and he naturally wonders how it benefits him. He puts in more work and gets less figs.

The only way possible to equalize the difference in the wages of labor between England and America by a protective tariff is to reduce the purchasing power of labor here by increasing the cost of what it lives on, the products out of which it is paid.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of fostering every industry, because national industry produces national wealth; but let our industries be fostered for the common good, and not for the especial benefit of a few. Those who create the wealth of the country ought to have a proprietary interest in it, and in a natural development of society wealth diffuses itself among the people and goes into the pockets of its rightful owners. Our protective policy can not add a farthing to our national wealth; it only redistributes it—transfers it from the hands of honest toil into the coffers of Shylocks.

Class legislation is the fruitful mother of all monopolies, and every monopoly created and sustained by law is a robber of labor. Science may furnish labor with arms of iron and fingers of steel; the good genius of invention may lighten its burdens and increase its productiveness a million-fold; the cunning of man may hitch to the wheels of industry every force of earth and sky; but if a fair and equitable distribution of its products is prevented by class laws, labor is only the menial serf of its capital lord. With a varied and fertile soil, genial skies, a hard-working people, and the application of science to their work, there has been an enormous increase in the production of wealth in this country—but who owns it? What is labor's share? How much more of the comforts and necessities of life will a day's work purchase?

Sir, this constant increase of wealth is accompanied by an almost constant decline in the proportion of that wealth which goes to support productive industry. It will not do to answer that wages are high in this country. It will not do even to answer that the rate of wages is increasing, because the cost of living is increasing in a greater ratio. You must go further and show that the purchasing power of labor is constantly increasing or you do not show any real prosperity among the working classes. That you can not do until we repeal every law that neutralizes the effect of high wages, every law that appreciates the value of salt, lumber, coal, iron, and clothes, and depreciates the value of the laboring man. There is nothing in all the earth so sacred as man, not even pig-iron, and every law that depreciates the value of his labor is an infamous cheat and a damnable fraud.

We often hear this protective system spoken of as the American system and its opponents as the supporters of the British system. We borrowed this system, with some other bad things, from England. It is not a native of this country. It is "grafted fruit." The American system, if I understand the genius of democracy, is a system of equal rights and equal privileges for all and special favors to none. England tried this protective system, and it blighted her soil, closed her factories, and blockaded her commerce. It bred discontent among her people. Threats of revolution filled the kingdom with fear. Labor went hungry and clothed in rags. The people were pauperized and driven to madness. Read the history of England by Harriet Martineau if you do not believe me when I say that protection brought England to the verge of penury and decay. Miss Martineau says that—

A committee of inquiry into the cause of the distress of the people reported in 1842—

The time when the fruit of protection had fully ripened—that a fourth of the population in Carlisle was in a state bordering on starvation, actually certain to die of famine unless relieved by extraordinary exertion. In the woolen districts of Wiltshire the allowance to the independent laborer was not two-thirds of the minimum in the work-house, and the large existing population consumed only a fourth of the bread and meat required by the much smaller population of 1820. In Stockport more than half of the master spinners had failed before the close of 1842; dwelling-houses to the number of 3,000 were shut up, and the occupiers of many hundreds more were unable to pay rates at all; 5,000 persons were walking the streets in compulsory idleness; millwrights and other trades were offering a premium on emigration to induce their hands to go away. At Hinckley one-third of the inhabitants were paupers; more than one-fifth of the houses stood empty, and there was not work enough in the place to employ properly one-third of the weavers; in families where the father had hitherto received £2 per week and laid by a portion weekly, and when all was now gone but the sack of shavings they slept on, exertions were made to get "blue milk" for children to moisten their oat-meal with, but soon they could have it only on alternate days, and soon water must do.

That, Mr. Chairman, was the fruitage of protection in England. It was not until she blotted from her statute-books her infamous protective laws that England entered upon her career of industrial and commercial supremacy. It was not until she pursued the path which Watt and Crompton and Cartwright pointed mankind that England won her victories in the fields of industry grander than any Waterloo.

Sir, in the discussion of this question we should keep in view not local, sectional interests, but the national life and prosperity. What is the best national policy? I believe that policy is best which secures a natural harmonious development of all our interests, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing; which grants equal privileges to all, special favors to none. I believe that policy is the worst which discriminates in favor of one interest and against another, which kills one business to build up another, which assassinates labor by unholy class legislation. I believe therefore that a gradual but certain reduction of our labor-degrading, monopoly-creating tariff taxes to the basis of a tariff for revenue only is demanded by the best interests of the nation.

Productive industry is the only capital that enriches a people, and its burden should be made as light and its yoke as easy as possible. We are not afraid of England's cannon, and why should we be afraid of her workshops and her factories? With our boundless treasury of natural wealth, with our splendid harbors and magnificent rivers, with the energy, virtue, skill, and inventive genius of our people, this nation is a majority against the world in peace or in war. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I regret any contest between the great industries of the country, and I am not here to strike one of them, but to bring them into harmonious relations by pointing out the abuses of our protective system. Their differences are business questions, arising from the changing conditions of a new and growing country and from the present unjust and unequal tariff act. The protectionists can not through partisan warfare silence the reasonable demands of great industries like agriculture and transportation, which have so generously supported them over a quarter of a century. The people have the right to insist upon a fair distribution of burdens and the gradual repeal of class legislation. There is common ground for adjustment and harmony.

It is wisdom for the industry possessing the greatest advantages through a law of Congress to divide them with others of equal importance and insure the business stability of both. The proposition before the House is reduction of tariff taxation. The public Treasury is overflowing with an idle surplus. Shall Congress permit high taxation to continue without necessity? Duties upon imports should be levied to raise revenue sufficient to support the Government and pay its just debts and obligations. No higher duties are necessary for any interest of this country at the present time. This kind of tariff makes sufficient revenue the object of the law and protection to home industries the incident. This is the Democratic doctrine.

A protective tariff makes protection to home industries from foreign competition the object of the law and sufficient revenue the incident, which is the Republican doctrine. Which one is best for the people of the whole country? Not which is the best for New England or Pennsylvania, Indiana or California. We are aided in choosing one of these doctrines by an examination of the present tariff act, enacted in 1861 as a war measure. It has been amended several times since, and may now be called a high protective and partially prohibitory law. The Democratic platforms of all the States condemn this law in unmeasured terms, and no Republican platform ever written indorses it. They are for protection, they say. Then why do not their platforms indorse the present tariff act as the work of the party? No, they skillfully avoid that by advocating a protective tariff. If the present law is right, let it alone; but if it is wrong, we should try to correct the wrong. Party integrity forbids concealment of our intentions on this great public question until we have the power to enact a law. The cause of tariff reform needs no evasion now for future advantage.

GROSS INEQUALITIES.

The present law contains gross inequalities, which impose the greatest burdens upon labor and men of moderate means, while those able to stand the burdens of taxation bear the least of all. The law provides that all low-priced goods, such as poor people must buy, shall pay nearly double the duty that fine grades of goods pay, which are purchased only by men of ample means. The purpose of this law was to levy the highest tax upon all goods that laboring people must buy. Why? It is fair to say that forty millions of our population are poor people and persons of small estates. They buy large quantities of low-priced goods of all kinds, and a high tariff upon them brings enormous profits to the manufacturer. This was wrong, for labor should be lightly burdened, because the poorest paid.

In another way the law is unjust. All agree that the citizen should pay taxes on his property values only. If he pays more tax than his neighbor who owns many times his property, it is an unjust and partial exaction, and he is deprived of one right of American citizenship—equal taxation by the law. It is impossible to compel the rich men and corporations in this country to pay their share of indirect tax under this unequal law, and it is quite as impossible for the poor to escape a greater tax than they should pay. This objection should be enough among fair-minded men. There are many thousands of men in this country worth from fifty thousand to hundreds of millions of dollars, not considering vast corporate wealth. A poor man buys $100 in woolen or mixed woolen goods per year, on which the average duty is 65 per cent. Here he pays $65 as an indirect tax, while his property will not inventory $1,000.

The millionaire pays this indirect tax also when he buys protected goods, but his most extravagant consumption will not begin to make his indirect taxation as high as that paid by the man owning $1,000. If the man worth $1,000 pays $65 indirect tax upon $100 of woolen goods, his annual purchase, how much tax must the millionaire pay to be equal with him? He must pay ten hundred times $65, or $65,000. The millionaire must pay $65,000 on this one article to make his indirect tax equal to the indirect tax of $65 paid by the man owning $1,000. It requires one thousand people to pay $65 each to be equal to the $65,000 which the millionaire never pays, but which he should do on the basis of equal taxation. This he does not begin to do. This calculation applies to the purchase of all other imported goods. In proportion to property values the rich man pays comparatively nothing, while the poor man pays an extravagant tax. The indirect tax under the protective system does not touch the wealth of the country, but falls upon the person, and very hard upon the laboring man, for he should not be burdened more than his wealthy neighbor. It is a high tax upon property purchased, not upon property owned, which unavoidably bears hard upon poor people. It being a tax paid by the person, when he buys protected goods it follows that over 40,000,000 of our population, old and young, pay nearly all the indirect tariff tax, while the wealth of the country pays comparatively nothing. If this system of taxation is necessary then it should be as low as can be with a view to sufficient revenue.

This system overrules the whole theory of American taxation. All bankable wealth, all corporate wealth, all other wealth escapes under the present tariff law. If we must have a high indirect tax to protect home industries, it ought to be based upon property values; then wealth could not go comparatively free. If there can not be an approximate equality of the burdens of taxation, then we should abandon the system rather than burden the poor of our country. I regret to say that a Republican Congress made this unjust and unequal law and maintained it ever since 1861, though its wrongs upon the consumer were frequently pointed out.

In 1882 a reform of this iniquitous law was attempted, but the work then done was not reform at all. The Tariff Commission made tariff schedules reducing the rate of taxation 25 per cent., but the Forty-seventh Congress refused to adopt them. It made and adopted independent schedules, which reduced taxation less than 2 per cent. I call attention of the House to the President's message to Congress. I ask the Clerk to read the extract I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To make a start in the proposed reduction of revenue from imports, the Tariff Commission had been created. In good faith it undertook the work. In its report to Congress it said: "Early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded, not by a mere indiscriminate popular clamor, but by the best conservative opinion of the country. * * * Such a reduction of the existing tariff the commission regards not only as a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers, but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction. Entertaining these views, the commission has sought to present a scheme of tariff duties in which substantial reduction should be the distinguishing feature. The average reduction in rates, including that from the enlargement of the free-list and the abolition of the duties on charges and commissions, at which the commission has aimed, is not less on the average than 20 per cent., and it is the opinion of the commission that the reduction will reach 25 per cent."

* * * * * * *

The chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, in explanation of the bill before the Senate last year, which after various amendments became a law, estimated at $45,000,000 the reduction of the revenue which would follow the changes in the tariff proposed thereby.

These intentions and calculations have not been verified.

* * * * * * *

So the question still presses, what legislation is necessary to relieve the people of unnecessary taxes?

Mr. WOOD. The President said, "so the question still presses what legislation is necessary to relieve the people of unnecessary taxes." Unnecessary taxes existed to such an extent as to call a special reference to it by a Republican President. It exists to-day as strong as ever, and will this House refuse an honest reduction? This bill reduces taxation over thirty millions. Will my Republican friends take the good advice of their President and aid us to make this moderate reduction? I appeal to them to do so, for the people demand it. It is a reasonable demand, because their tax burdens are unnecessary.

The average duty under the new law is about 42 per cent., against 44 per cent. under the old law, and the gross inequalities of the old law were carried into the new one without change. Under the system of high taxation of the old law the surplus revenue exceeded one hundred millions. The new act does not materially lower this, as you see by the slight reduction of the duties. The people are not blind to the conduct of Congress, and this pretentious reform will not deceive them.

I want to be fair with the manufacturer, but he should act fairly with consumers of manufactured goods. The manufacturer who has a practical monopoly by high protection will not say his monopoly is right.

I want the Clerk to read what two or three manufacturers say on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Barnett Whorff, a Skowhegan manufacturer, says:

"I was brought up a Whig and in favor of a protective tariff, but it is not so clear to my mind at the present time that a high protective tariff is for the best interest of the country and majority of the people thereof. The iron and woolen industries are the most highly protected of any and are suffering the most to-day. I have used iron to some extent for forty years, but think that my business was never more depressed than now, not by competition with foreign manufacturers—for there is no importation of axes into this State or country of any amount; a few may be brought from New Brunswick and a few from Canada—but the trouble seems to be overproduction or general stagnation in business, so that it is difficult for me to form an opinion on the tariff question satisfactory to myself. I think that coal and salt should be on the free-list. It is not so clear to my mind as to lumber. I am in favor of a revision of the tariff, and think that all the necessaries of life used by the laboring class should be on the free-list, or nearly so."

Two Republican manufacturers of Belfast, Sherman and Thompson by name, step out boldly with these sentiments:

"We do not object to the Morrison bill. Lumber, salt, and coal free will benefit more than injure. We are manufacturers and wish to have our manufactures protected, but too much protection is morally wrong and injurious. According to our observations Republicans as well as Democrats favor low tariff in this vicinity on necessaries. Rum, tobacco, and such like we would place on the high-list."

Mr. WOOD. The abuses and inequalities of the present tariff mainly arise from the specific duties imposed, and I cite a case in point: In Schedule I a specific duty of 3½ cents per square yard of bleached cotton under 100 threads to the square inch and a duty of 4½ cents to the square yard of the same grade of unbleached or colored goods is charged to the importer, and the specific duty is increased on the same kind of goods over 100 threads to the square inch. There are more than a dozen classes of these goods now paying similar specific duties; but to illustrate the enormity of this tariff take one class of cotton goods 36 inches in width, which costs 1½ cents per yard to manufacture in Glasgow; the custom-house valuation at New York is 3.4 cents per yard. This makes a duty equal to an ad valorem duty of about 148 per cent.

If you calculate Scottish money worth nearly double our own, it would make the duty over 80 per cent. ad valorem. Out of twelve kinds of cotton goods imported the tariff is more than 112 per cent. on seven, and one class in the dozen is as low as 71 per cent. The specific duties on these articles average 111 per cent. ad valorem according to the value of American money. This enormous tariff is levied upon a class of goods constantly needed and chiefly used by the poor classes of our people, while silk, broadcloth, and velvets do not pay an average of half as much duty. The manufacturers in Glasgow buy our cotton, which is raised, gathered, ginned, and prepared for the market by thousands of laboring people, and manufacture it into all kinds of cotton fabrics, send them to American markets, and compel the thousands of laboring people to pay this enormous duty, as it is charged to them in the price of the article, though it is directly paid by the importer. Does this tariff benefit labor?

England buys our wool in large quantities and imports it free of duty. Her manufacturers pay no Government tax on this raw material. This wool is commingled with finer grades of wool produced in other countries and manufactured into woolen and part-woolen fabrics of all kinds, and shipped to the American ports, where a duty of 65 per cent. is paid, and then it enters the American markets, and the laboring people who guarded, fed, and sheared the sheep, washed the wool, and prepared it for the market, as well as those who raised the grain, buy their clothing with 65 per cent. bounty added, $6.50 for every $10 paid for woolen or part-woolen clothing. Does this tariff benefit labor? England and other countries buy our raw materials, import them free of duty. They are manufactured into goods of all kinds and shipped to the American markets, and our Government collects high duties upon the goods made from the raw materials our people have sold, and compels the very producers of them and their workmen to pay these high duties when they purchase the goods. Does this benefit labor? This high bounty comes out of the wages of labor and out of the pockets of the producer. Every person in this land uses cotton goods; and whom does this tariff benefit? The manufacturer of New England only. Why? The duty is so high as to partially prohibit the import of this class of cotton goods. During the war the duty on these grades of cotton goods was 35 per cent. ad valorem. Then one-half of all that our people consumed was imported.

Under the present high specific duty only one-fifth of all we consume is imported, yet the import fixes the price for the home manufacturer and the consumer pays it. Why should this enormous duty of 111 per cent. be levied upon this class of goods, when the labor cost in Scotland is only 15 per cent. and in the United States only 25 per cent. of the cost of the manufactured article? To build up home monopoly. That is the answer. In this instance there is just enough of the imported article to establish the price of this class of goods manufactured in the United States. The mills of New England manufacture four-fifths of the entire amount consumed in this country, and pocket 111 per cent., the average duty, for every yard sold to our people. The home manufacturer will not undersell the importer, because he wants the benefit of the duty which the importer pays to the Government. If he did undersell the importer, then there would be no imports at all of this class of cotton goods, but there is imported one-fifth of the entire amount consumed by the people, on which the average duty of 111 per cent. is paid.

This duty is added to the selling price, for the importer must have the duty paid back when he sells the article. This, then, fixes the price of one-fifth of the cotton goods consumed. Will the other four-fifths manufactured here sell for a less price than the one-fifth? Certainly not. The home manufacturer sells the four-fifths, his own manufacture, at the same price as the imported one-fifth is sold, and takes the benefit of the shameful duty.

Can my Republican friends give an excuse for their vote in the Forty-seventh Congress in favor of this shameful duty? Did they not know that vote maintained a home monopoly that unjustly takes money from the scant wages of labor and extorts unwilling tribute from the consumers all over this country?

SCHEDULE J.

In this schedule all cotton thread, yarn, or warp yarn, in skeins or bundles or other form, if worth 25 cents per pound, the tariff is 10 cents per pound; if worth over 25 cents and less than 40 cents, the tariff is 15 cents per pound; and so on through the list. The goods described in this schedule pay a duty nearly one-half of their market value. If the farmer paid this rate of tax upon his property he would be driven into bankruptcy. Ten per cent. interest is a high rate for money loaned, yet the farmer and the workingman pay 40 to 50 per cent. upon all this class of goods they buy. But the end is not here. From the cotton yarn, warp, and thread which pay this enormous duty is manufactured cotton cloth and other goods, which are loaded down also with duties ranging from 50, 80, to 148 per cent. ad valorem. So duty upon duty is added when one class of goods is used to manufacture another kind.

WOOLEN SCHEDULE.

I now go to the wool and woolen schedule of this famous reform law, and I find wool, the raw material, paying a duty of 33⅓ to 40 per cent. per pound, according to value. From wool is manufactured cloth, shawls, flannels, blankets, wool hats, knit goods, and many other articles, all loaded down with an additional duty of 85 to 88½ cents per pound. Women's and children's dress goods made wholly or in part from the dutiable wool pay specific duties equal to an ad valorem duty of 65 to 75 per cent. per square yard! Count the yards necessary to dress the average family, and you will have some idea of the shameful tribute paid by the consumer. You must not stop here in calculating tariff prices. Count the tariff rate upon the cotton warp and again upon the warp when woven into cloth.

SCHEDULE C.

I call attention of the House to Schedule C, metals, &c., and see what duties iron and steel pay. Begin with iron ore. Iron ore is charged with a duty of 75 cents per ton. From the ore is made pig-iron, which is charged with a duty of $6 per ton. Pig-iron is run into bar-iron, &c., and that pays a duty of $20 per ton. Bar-iron, round iron, and flat iron is made into spikes, nails, and other articles, which pay a duty of $25 per ton, while horseshoe-nails, hob-nails, wire nails, wrought-iron and steel nails pay a duty of $80 per ton; chains pay $35 to $50 per ton, and fence-wire $12 per ton. These rates apply substantially to iron and steel blooms. The blooms are made into iron and steel goods of every description, such as saws, files, rivets, nuts, rods, screws, and edge-tools of every kind, and all are charged with other high duties. I ask the Clerk to read a statement made in the discussion of steel duties.

Allow me to call attention to the profits of the iron and steel industries. In 1880 there were 1,005 establishments, with a capital of over $230,971,874. Their iron and steel products were valued at $296,557,685; value of material, $191,271,150; wages paid, $55,476,785. The profit is $49,809,750, or 21.56 per cent. on the capital invested. The average wages paid was $1.31 per day. In 1880 there were thirty-six establishments engaged in the manufacture of steel, with $20,975,990 capital. Their manufactured product amounted to $55,805,210; value of materials, $36,826,928; wages paid, $4,930,349. The profit was $14,047,933, or 67 per cent. upon the capital. Average wages paid $1.50 per day. Here is astounding profits and low wages. This is protection for you in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

We beg to call your attention to the duties on steel as mentioned in Schedule C, metals, in the act of March 3, 1883, wherein, after providing certain rates on all kinds and qualities of steel, an additional duty of 1 cent per pound is levied on steel circular-saw plates. This discrimination makes the duty on these amount to 4½ cents per pound. Previous to the enactment of this law the duty on steel circular-saw plates up to 46 inches in diameter was only 3 cents per pound, and above 46 inches in diameter it was 3½ cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. The present rate of duty is equal, on an average, to about 35 per cent. of the foreign market value of the article. We use these plates largely in our business, and consider the present duty excessive and unjust, and respectfully hope that your bill will remove this discriminating paragraph and have steel circular-saw plates taxed no more than other grades of steel of the same value.

THE STEEL DUTIES.

[Copy of a letter addressed to the Iron Age, and published by that paper in its issue of March 13, 1884.]

To the Editor of The Iron Age:

SIR: Your article entitled "Consolidation of manufactures," in your issue dated February 28, seems to be against the consumer of steel and his efforts and wish for a reduction of the tariff on that necessary commodity. Your sympathies are more strongly expressed in favor of the manufacturer of steel and his success in keeping up the high duties, which some consumers have felt to be oppressive. You are right in saying "there is no reason why a steel works should not also make axes, saws, shovels, &c.," and no sane consumer of steel will attempt to dispute the statement. Many consumers of steel, however, who have succeeded in establishing industries have reason to complain about a tariff that is giving the steel-makers such a profit that they are rich enough to invest capital in the manufacture of axes, saws, shovels, &c., and put them in the market at prices that are ruinous to those who have been their customers and out of whom they have made their riches.

At the same time these consumers have not realized profit enough from their business to allow them to engage in making steel. Many who have heretofore voted for and advocated a tariff for protection now believe that the popular cry for protection has been used in some places not merely for the purpose of securing protection but to secure the creation of monopolies. Can any one show that duties of $44.80 per ton on low grades and $95.20 per ton on the high grades of crucible steel are needed for protection only? These high duties have been the means of keeping up high prices and unequal profits. They are duties that are so highly favorable to the producer of a raw material that he is enabled to manufacture goods out of it at a price which while it affords him a profit will be ruinous to those who do not make their own raw material. These rates seem too high to one who has advocated protection from the days of Henry Clay to the present time and a consumer of steel who believes that they operate in favor of monopoly and against the principles of protection.

AN OLD PROTECTIONIST.

Mr. WOOD. Human genius could not devise more jobbery covered by the forms of law than is contained in the metal schedule of this reform act.

SCHEDULE M.

I call attention to Schedule M of this odious law. It contains paper of all kinds. I am asked, "Why do you desire to reduce the tariff on paper, when it is only 15 to 20 per cent.?" Let us see. The raw material, wood pulp, is charged with 10 per cent. ad valorem. The raw material out of which paper is made is loaded down with high duties, and when it is manufactured into paper for blank-books, bound or unbound, then another duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem is added. When printing-paper, sized or unsized, used for books or newspapers is made, then 15 per cent. more is added. This kind of dodging to hide a high protective tariff is called reform.

GLASS SCHEDULE.

The people pay for window-glass $3,000,000 per year as class exaction. How? The amount imported last year was about $1,427,073. The duty paid the Government was $979,738, or about 67 per cent. The home manufacture last year was valued at five millions. It sold for the same price as the imported article, and the domestic manufacturer received the benefit of the 67 per cent. duty upon this sum, which makes $3,350,000 paid by the people, not one cent of which went into the public Treasury. It is idle talk that the home product did not sell for the same price as the imported article. If the domestic manufacturer undersold the importer, then the import of glass would cease, but the importer did sell in the American markets near one million and a half dollars of window-glass, and the home product did not undersell it so as to drive the imported article out of the markets.

No party can stand before the consumers of this country and sustain a tariff like this. But this is what my Republican friends on the other side of this House call reform. Is robbery of the consumer more complete? No other civilized country imposes such burdens upon the many to support the few under the guise of national benefit. Every laboring man in this country, whether in the factories or out of them, pays an enormous tax when he clothes himself and family. There are about 9,000,000 of laboring men in the United States independent of the farming class. You can almost count the millions taken from their daily wages annually by this cruel and exacting law. There are about 8,000,000 farmers who bear the same burden. This tariff law takes from the pockets of the people over $500,000,000 annually. No other people could stand this unjust drain of annual profits for any considerable time, and our own people, owning in fee splendid farms of incomparable soil, aided by the improvements of farm machinery, are able to produce enormous quantities of the cereals and all farm products for home and foreign markets; but withal they are only able to stand the pressure for a few years, when financial distress comes and involves a vast number of them.

DIVERSIFIED INDUSTRY.

The present tariff, unequal in its protection, is ruinous to diversified industries. Capital is selfish. It seeks the investment that brings the heaviest returns. The tariff on cotton and woolen goods, iron, and steel is so protective that it stimulated unnatural prices, which invited an overbalance of capital for investment in these industries, and the result is overproduction. I ask the Clerk to read from the report of Mr. Swank for the American Iron and Steel Association, made May 1, 1883.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the beginning of June nearly all the mills referred to (rolling-mills of Pittsburgh and the West) were closed by a general strike which continued until the last of September, when work was resumed upon the scale of wages which had previously prevailed. During the strike of four months the prices of rolled iron did not advance, notwithstanding the stoppage of so many mills, a fact which clearly demonstrated that the capacity to produce this form of iron had again, as in the panic years, exceeded the demand. * * * At the same time it must be frankly admitted that our rolling-mill capacity has for some time been in advance of the consumptive wants of the country, and that the check to the overproduction of rolled iron which was afforded by the strike of 1882 was in no sense a calamity to the manufacturers.

Mr. WOOD. Many unprotected industries languish all over this country because of the unequal investment of capital in the highly protected industries, and labor is poorly paid or wholly unemployed. The class favoritism of this Government has caused depression in all kinds of business. The equanimity of trade, the only basis of true prosperity, is disturbed by the overproduction of the standard goods, and the millions of money invested in them is now inactive and helpless, and a sympathetic depression pervades all other industries. This is the history of protection.

INJUSTICE TO FARMERS.

Protection compels the farmer, numerically the greatest class of consumers, to pay high prices for all he buys, while he is compelled to sell the products of the farm at free-trade prices. The protective tariff establishes the price of manufactured articles at home, but fails to establish a price for wheat and beef. That is fixed in the free-trade markets of the world. Farmers buy under protection and sell under free trade. High protection makes high prices for imported goods. If the domestic manufacturer sold his goods cheaper than the imported article they would exclude the latter from our markets. The home manufacturer will not compete with the importer, because it is against his interest to do so. He wants enough of the imported article to come into our markets to pay the high duties and establish prices. That is the index for the home product.

The prices of domestic manufactured goods will not be fixed by home competition under high protection. We can have competition among domestic manufacturers only by enacting a prohibitory tariff to exclude imports altogether or have no tariff at all. The manufacturers do not want a prohibitory tariff nor free trade. They want a high protective tariff that admits foreign goods to our markets on payment of high duties, and they take the price of the importer, after duties paid, for their price. Here is an example: The Government received about thirty millions of revenue from the import of manufactured woolens last year. The home product amounted to four times the imported article, or about two hundred millions. The average duty on woolens is about 65 per cent. ad valorem.

The importer paid the Government thirty millions in duties, charged it to the selling price of his goods, and our people purchased them and paid the duties; but when the people purchased the two hundred millions of the home-manufactured article they paid no less price for it than they did for the imported article. If the people could buy the home product cheaper would they buy the imported article? Certainly not. There is no difference in the prices of the imported and domestic article. The farmers and other consumers pay 65 per cent. on two hundred millions of the domestic product, which goes to the benefit of the manufacturer.

This tribute given and none returned brings periodical distress to the farmer, and he is met with the sneering query, "If you have anything to sell, can not you get a good price for it?" He has sold his products to the minimum and has saved little or nothing from the prices received, for the reason the tariff has robbed him, silently robbed him, at the end of a series of years. He has sold at Liverpool prices instead of the promised high prices of the home market. No class of men work harder and save less than the average farmer. We are told that the farmers have prospered under protection. They have prospered in one way, and that is in the increased value of their farm lands, which came by crowded settlements and shipping facilities. Value their lands at $50 per acre, count cost of labor, fencing, farming implements burdened with protection prices in all their parts, keeping work-horses, and he can not raise wheat for less than 80 cents per bushel and corn for less than 20 cents.

I agree that Western farms show evidence of prosperity; but how many years of patient toil do they represent? You must go back forty to fifty years for a beginning on these farms. If protection has made good farms, it has been slow indeed. A man works forty years from daylight to darkness upon his farm, makes himself a hard taskmaster, and if he is economical in his living before he dies he can build a barn worth $800 and a house worth $1,500 to $2,000. Yes, farms look prosperous by a lifetime of toil and close economy.

Tell me this is the fruit of a protective tariff! No; that yields him exceeding bitter fruit. All the farmer wears and uses in his business from his pocket-knife to a tin pan is forced up to double its value by tariff law, while he sells his farm products at home and abroad for prices fixed by competition in Europe. Talk to the farmers about pauper labor! They are forced to sell their wheat at Liverpool, if they sell at all, and there they come in direct competition with the pauper labor of the Baltic, where only $18 per year is paid for farm labor, and a worse competition with the labor of Egypt. Why the anxiety to protect manufacturing industries, many of them over fifty years old and worth millions of dollars, from the pauper labor of Europe, while you see the large body of agriculturists, on whom the prosperity of the country depends, selling the products of their labor in competition with the poorest of all pauper labor, the unskilled labor of Egypt?

HOME MARKET FOR THE FARMERS.

The promise of protection is a home market for farm products. That is a humbug. The American people can not and never will consume the products of the American farm. To do that you must import 20,000,000 people and put them in the factories and workshops. Then a worse result would follow on the other side—overproduction of manufactured articles. In 1880 the American people only consumed 64 per cent. of the farm products. I heard a Western farmer say, "Why, see for yourself. Take the surplus of six great farm States, then count the number of people protected and their employés, and each one of them would have to eat six barrels of flour per day, a ton of beef, 1,000 pounds of bacon, chew a hogshead of tobacco, and drink twenty gallons of Kentucky whisky." It is nonsense. They advise less farmers. That would not increase consumption and would not lessen production materially, as improved farm machinery takes the place of men on the farm. The home market for farm products goes farther away every year.

In 1860 the farmers raised $170,000,000 in wheat, and exported $4,070,764, or 2½ per cent. of the product.

In 1870, high-protective-tariff year, they produced $550,000,000 in wheat, and exported $47,171,229, or 14 per cent. of the product. In 1880, same tariff, they produced $425,000,000 in wheat, and exported $190,546,305, or 36 per cent of the total product. The export of pork will average $70,000,000 annually since 1870, excepting the time of French and German interdiction. The export of beef and beef cattle exceed this during the same years. There was also a large export of corn and provisions. Farm products overstock the home markets more and more every year, though protection has been on trial for nearly thirty years to fulfill the great promise of a home market for the products of the farm. It is a failure.

THE WORLD'S MARKET FOR FARMERS.

The splendid soil of the great West and South will always produce a large surplus. The seasons never fail to bring it from mother earth. What shall we do with it? I answer, sell it in the markets of the world and bring the gold and products of other countries home. Gold is enduring wealth. It is unlike the exchange of commodities that soon perish. Protection is the great barrier to the world's markets for our agricultural and manufactured products. The people of other countries will not trade with us if we make trade expensive to them by payment of high duties. The Government can not enact laws making international commerce expensive to foreign peoples and then ask them to buy of us what we have to sell but not buy of them unless they first pay high duties for the privilege of selling goods in our markets. The trouble is we treat the rest of the world unfairly. We want free trade when we sell our products to other countries but have high protection against the people of other countries selling to us. Many countries have retaliated and others are doing so.

The French and German exclusion of American pork, a great farm product, was only retaliation. I admonish the farmers to vote for their own interest upon this important question, for the foreign markets in American cereals and meats is threatened by our high protective policy against the commerce of the world. When the open markets of the world are closed to the American farmer what will he do with his surplus? England, our greatest foreign market, is encouraging wheat-raising in India, where twelve bushels to the acre can be produced by the crudest farming, and in 1881 and 1882 she received from India nearly 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, against 75,000,000 from America.

Do our farmers know how important the foreign markets are to them? Over six hundred millions of dollars' worth of American farm products are sold in foreign markets annually. Break down this great market by continuing your protection policy, and where will this six-hundred-million surplus go? As I have said, the commercial traders of other countries will not permit America to build up a great trade with them in agricultural products when America closes her ports to their trade by high protective duties and heavily taxes our people to do it that a favored class may prosper.

The farmer is told that there is a tariff upon farm products, but how does that benefit him? Not any. Why? Will farm products in any considerable quantities be shipped to the United States when our own farmers produce more than they want and have a large surplus to sell in the world's markets? When our farmers raise grain and provisions and sell them in the open markets of the world against all competition, will the agricultural products of other countries come to America? It is very plain that the tariff duties levied upon farm products is no benefit to the farmer and may just as well be taken from the list. Without foreign markets wheat will rot in the stack and provisions go to waste. Farmers are advised by the protectionists to quit farming; only produce enough for home consumption. Then the laboring people would bear the burdens of dear bread and meat. That policy would lessen production, but what kind of a policy is that? Lessen the business of farmers to increase other industries!

Cramp one great industry for the benefit of another is strange advice indeed. Prosperity will not result that way. New England wants her cotton-mills protected but extends no protection to the Western flouring-mill. Pennsylvania insists on high protection for iron and steel but cares not for the protection of Western wheat, flour, and meats, and she could not give protection if she would. If it were possible to compel New England and Pennsylvania to pay a duty of 50 to 100 per cent. upon every barrel of flour and every dollar's worth of Western hams and beef, butter and cheese she consumed it would even up the tariff and be fair; but Congressmen could not sleep until it removed such duties, for all New England would be in Washington before twenty-four hours. Yet New England receives, by a law of Congress, a tribute of 50 to 100 per cent. from the Western farmer upon her manufactured products and holds on with the grip of death. It is not fair. It is not right.

The protective system arrays section against section, for special favoritism granted by this Government to a class of the people at the expense of all the other classes will not be borne in silence, and ought not to be. Our protective policy has driven our merchant vessels from the high seas, and our ocean trade is carried in foreign-built ships owned by citizens of foreign countries. The immense cost of ocean transportation is paid to foreign ship-owners, and millions of money is taken away from our channels of trade. The wheat and meat shipped from America to England pays a double charge for the round trip, for the reason the ship returns to New York with ballast, and therefore the cost of one voyage is taken out of the farmers' wheat, flour, and beef. If the returning vessel could ship the products of other countries here which are excluded from our markets by high protection, then half the cost of transportation would be saved to the pockets of the farmer, an item of great importance.

Why is England so great in trade and commerce? She was not made so by internal trade with her own people, but by the commerce of the world. America to-day can trade in all the countries where England trades and offers better advantages for the world's commerce, and it will come if we welcome it. It will not come without reciprocity. America must trade with the world if the world trades with America. Then the agricultural surplus will go rapidly away and our manufactured products find willing purchasers over the seas; then labor will be employed and amply paid. But our protection policy says to England, to France and Germany, to Mexico and the South American States, that America will not trade with you; we want none of the world's commerce; we are independent of the rest of the world in this age.

This policy says keep away, if you please, from our shores. We are establishing a new world and will trade only with ourselves. We are going to cut loose from the rest of the universe and know the nations of the earth no more forever. We believe Confucius was right when he built a wall against civilization and rejected the commerce of all peoples and all nations. We are going back a few thousand years in commercial history, for our latter-day commerce is all wrong. The world's trade is mischievous. No more trade outside of the United States is the policy. Erect a great sign on the Atlantic shore from Maine to Florida to tell the denizens of other countries to come here no more, to order ocean ships to lower sail and turn back with their cargoes. We are going to build home markets. We want none of your trade, none of your money, none of your civilization. We have a monopoly of these, and are going to keep them.

This policy means no merchant marine to whiten the sea with the sails of commerce; cease all continental navigation, cast compass and chart into the sea. Men of the Mississippi Valley, rich in millions of grain, loading down the highways of commerce, ship no more on the waters of the great river that rolls majestically down to the sea. Halt at the ocean's wave. Do not say we are seeking the world's market for the millions of surplus produced in the grandest valley of the world. Sir, we want a Moses to lead the agricultural children through the wilderness of protection. They want a Joshua to lead them out of bondage and over the sea, when protection will be swallowed up forever.

REVENUE TARIFF OF 1848.

Under the revenue tariff of 1848, which continued until 1861, manufactories rapidly increased and the country became prosperous, and no one thought of changing this tariff law until the war came upon us. Scheming men took advantage of national distress and procured the amendment of that law, from time to time since the war, solely for their personal benefit. What was the result? Many men became millionaires and many the owners of many millions in a short time. Such an aggregation of wealth in the hands of the few was not known before 1861. What does it mean? That certain classes were favored by this Government to make money off of the people. This extraordinary wealth was taken from the pockets of the many. It shows a bad state of economy. Why did you, my Republican friends, inaugurate this system? Why do you maintain it? Statistics are cited to show prosperity under protection. What are they on this point? Between 1850 and 1860 the wealth of this country increased from seven billions to sixteen billions. It more than doubled in ten years under the revenue tariff. Between 1860 and 1880, under a protective tariff our wealth increased nineteen billions. It required twenty years to double under a high protective tariff. Protection shows a decrease of 50 per cent. when compared with the years of a revenue tariff.

NEW ENGLAND INDUSTRIES.

I am told that New England industries can not exist without high protection. That means they must be supported by the rest of the country. They can not support themselves. They must live from taxing the people of the United States. Well, all of us would like to live that way. If a man starts a business in New England that does not pay, it is fashionable to apply to the Government to aid him. The Government in the hands of the Republican party is used as a machine to aid the industry that is not able to go alone, and all the people are commanded by law to step up and pay taxes indirectly to build it up and enrich the owners. The industry itself does not pay its owners, but the people of the country pay for it the profits it never earns. The owner draws a sort of pension from individual pockets and keeps the industry running as a kind of plaything. The owner tells everybody, "My machine don't pay; but the people pay me to run it, and as long as they pay me I am going to do it."

Oh, what a Government! This policy must cease. The Government is a good deal what the party in charge makes it. The people will not permit this great Government to be used to enrich men, because it is so wrong and unjust. We will never have a firm basis of business under protection. It is the father of inflated prices and the cruel mother of reverses. Take one instance. The copper industry flourished near Baltimore and in Massachusetts before 1861. Our people then had a good commercial trade with Chili, which took our manufactured goods and gave us in return copper ores, brought in return cargo in American ships, and smelted by American workmen. During the war everybody demanded a high tariff, and the copper-mine owners of Michigan obtained high duties on copper ore.

The American smelting works were crushed and the workmen thrown out of employment. We lost our commercial trade with Chili, and England took advantage of our blunder and has our old trade with Chili to-day. Why all this loss? To build up the owners of a copper mine in Michigan. The Michigan copper men sell their copper cheaper in England than they do to our own manufacturers, and we are therefore depressed at home for the advantage of foreign consumers of copper. This mine needs no protection. It is able to stand against the world and make reasonable profits.

I am told the woolen and cotton industries can not exist without high protection. That doctrine has caused all the reverses in these industries. True, the high tariff stimulated them, and they sailed on a high plane of prosperity for a season, but it was only a strong stimulant that did it. It was not the business itself that brought such enormous and unnatural profits, but the influence of the stimulant. Your protection is only a stimulant. It gives no lasting benefits. It is like any other stimulant, only lasting for a time, when a break-down must come. The difficulty in these stimulations is that the whole business of the country naturally adjusts itself to the stimulating forces, and when the break comes all is disastrously affected, and in the end more harm than good falls upon the country.

The business of the country, the great industries, must get out of the notion that Government stimulus is of any lasting benefit. The protective stimulus made prices of woolen and cotton goods so high that the people were dissatisfied and clamored for cheaper goods. What was the result? Human genius went to work and produced counterfeit imitations of the genuine article, and the demand was so great for cheaper goods that the country was soon flooded with them. Combings, flax, rejected wool, shoddy, and all kinds of cheap materials were so skillfully woven and finished as to present the appearance of genuine woolen and cotton goods, and they entirely undersold the true articles. A reduction of the tariff will reduce the prices. Why? The imported cottons and woolens can sell for a lower price with the payment of smaller duties, and the home product must come down to the price of the imported article or not sell at all. You see how the tariff affects prices.

Our protection friends tell me a high tariff does not make high prices, and they argue the point all over the country, but when we talk of low tariff, oh, then prices are wonderfully affected and they will starve. They concede lower prices by a lower tariff, but they will not concede high prices by a high tariff. When the time comes that there is not such a wide difference in the cost of the genuine and the spurious article, then the people will buy the good in preference to the bad, and the latter must quit the market; then these depressed industries will do a regular business on a firm basis. This is a law of business.

If our great industries can not exist now after so many years of high protection, then it is conclusive proof that the system is a failure and it is no use for the country to longer support them. They bitterly complain when the tariff is even talked about. The agitation of the subject, they say, unsettles business. If all this be true, what unsound foundations they rest upon. They are built upon the sand, to fall when the tide rises. If their foundations are so frail that they give away when business principles are discussed, then protection is a complete failure to build up home industries. If it builds not better than that we had better abolish the system. If the business of the country can stand high taxation that produces an annual surplus of one hundred millions, it can certainly stand the agitation that proposes a reduction of over thirty millions, which this bill proposes to do. I never heard before that agitation for a reduction of taxes hurt the business of the country.

HOME COMPETITION TO REDUCE PRICES.

My protection friends tell me to keep up a high tariff and soon home industries will compete and high prices will come down. The people have relied upon this promise for near thirty years, for they are patient and kind to our manufacturing industries. I would do nothing to hurt them, but they must not hurt all the people indefinitely. I am talking for the benefits of our industries and not against them. I am their friend and would do any just and reasonable thing for them, but I sincerely tell them their advantages over the people, given by a law of Congress, is not for their lasting benefit and is a great wrong upon their patrons, the people, whose cordial support and confidence they can not dispense with.

What more competition in iron and steel, woolen and cotton goods can we have? These industries have produced a large surplus, and any more of them would do no good. They already manufacture more than they can sell in the home markets. They will not compete on prices as long as the price is fixed by the importer. They know that the importer must gauge the price by the duty he pays and the cost of transportation. If our high tariff did not increase and maintain high prices, why are two hundred and fifty iron and steed manufacturers petitioning Congress not to lower the tariff on iron and steel? Why are the woolen and cotton manufacturers doing the same thing? The promise of home competition, like the others made, has not been fulfilled.

Parley Banks is a heavy dealer in woolens and cottons in Indianapolis, Ind. He goes to Scotland and England and buys one or two hundred thousand dollars in cotton and woolen goods. He pays 65 per cent. duty to this Government. He goes to the New England mills and buys the same quantity of woolen and cotton goods, and pays no duty to the Government. He ships the imported and domestic goods to his wholesale house in Indianapolis. Now, will he sell the product of the New England mills cheaper than the imported article? Certainly not. If he did, the home product would soon go out of his store while the imported article would remain there. You must see there can be no competition under this system. You do not find men dealing wholly in the domestic article and others dealing wholly in the imported article. If that was the business situation, competition would arise between the domestic and the imported article, but men are too smart in this age to permit such conditions in business, and there is no remedy to lower prices but by reducing the tariff. I am credibly informed that over half of the capital invested in our highly protected industries belongs to English capitalists, and the benefits of high prices are for England more than for America.

PROTECTION NO BENEFIT TO THE PEOPLE.

My protection friends point me to the expanded business of the country during the last twenty years and ask me to contemplate the grand result of the protective system. Pardon me while I examine this claim, for if it is true then I am a protectionist. What is high protection? I answer that it is high taxation. Does high taxation benefit the country? Does it help the people? Does high taxation bring commercial blessings to the commonwealth? I can not recall the truth of such a claim in any event. The country has developed in the face of the protective system. In the last twenty years great railroads spanned the continent. The rich lands of the great West became homesteads for millions of producers. The mineral wealth yielded bountifully when railroads opened the way to American capital and Yankee energy. Science and inventive genius have encircled the nations with the telegraph and fast-going steamships have brought all countries together. Our population has increased millions upon millions in twenty years. Emigration has been unprecedented in numbers. Increasing labor and increasing wants of the millions have expanded the business of the country as much as anything.

I seriously object to protection, because it makes the rich richer and keeps down the poor to a common level. I think the poor people and owners of small estates number about 40,000,000 of our population. An unjust exaction of $5 apiece aggregates two hundred millions. These people have not materially improved their financial condition in the last fifteen years. They have lived and raised their families, but have not generally increased their estates. These pay the high protective duties. The millions come from them. The classes that have prospered under protection have done so at the expense of these 40,000,000 of people. What does protection cost the people? They pay as a tribute over five hundred millions per annum, not one cent of which goes into the public Treasury. This fact is fully shown by a table I have marked Exhibit A. If this enormous drain of hard-earned money was collected as home taxes are, the indignation of the people could not be controlled. They pay it in percentage upon all they buy at the dry-goods and grocery stores.

When they buy cotton or woolen goods of any class or kind they pay 65 to 111 per cent. When they buy boots and shoes they pay 30 per cent.; brooms and brushes, 30 per cent.; buttons, 45 per cent.; carpets, 49 per cent.; clothing, from 40 to 60 per cent.; felt goods, 50 per cent.; drugs and chemicals, 37 per cent.; flavoring extracts, 50 per cent.; food preparations, 20 per cent.; furniture, 50 per cent.; glass, 68 per cent.; hats and caps, 30 to 50 per cent.; house-furnishing goods, 25 to 45 per cent.; hosiery, 45 to 55 per cent.; leather, 30 per cent.; linen goods, 40 per cent.; millinery goods, 40 to 50 per cent.; rubber goods, 25 to 30 per cent.; soap, 20 to 28 per cent.; sugar and molasses, 15 to 35 per cent.; tinware and copperware, 45 per cent., varnish, 40 per cent.; flannels and blankets, 65 per cent.; women and children's dress goods, 64 per cent.; and so on through the list of six hundred articles charged with an average duty of 42 per cent. They are described, with rate of tariff, with cost of labor in each article, and excess of tariff over cost of labor, in a table marked Exhibit B.

Everything the people buy is loaded down with this enormous tax. There is no escape from paying it when you buy any kind of groceries or goods. The people do not know when they pay it. It is a silent theft of small amounts on everything, great and small, the people buy. If any farmer will keep account of all he buys at the store and take the tariff table I have marked Exhibit B, he can safely calculate the silent tax he has paid by reason of high protection.

Mr. Speaker, I am a conservative man, but I am in doubt whether I would support open petit larceny in preference to this ceaseless, silent theft of the people's money. It is larceny made lawful by an act of Congress, and it succeeds in taking from the pockets of 50,000,000 of people over $500,000,000 every year. It goes to over three hundred kinds of industries.

REDUCTION OF TAXATION TO FOLLOW REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES.

The people want reduction in taxation. We are reducing expenditures. That will not help the people. All expenditures might cease and the people would derive no benefit from it without any reduction of the rates of taxation. I would leave the hundred million surplus in the Treasury in the pockets of the people. Let it be used in business and circulate in the channels of trade. We do not want a surplus in the public Treasury. Cut down the rates of taxation. This bill cuts off over thirty millions. It tends in the right direction.

LABOR.

The monopolists appeal for protective duties to pay for labor. Their solicitude for labor is touching. No man desires to hurt American labor, and no one does so but the monopolists themselves. They employ 5 per cent. of the labor of the United States. They do not speak for all the other labor in the country. They do not speak for agricultural labor. What does protection offer for all the labor of the country outside of the factories? Nothing. The laborers in the factories and mills of New England are not paid more wages than is paid in England, all things considered. There is no inducement for the skilled labor of other countries to seek this country for employment. The English cotton-weavers are paid from $4 to $8.60 per week; New England weavers get $4.82 to $8.37 per week. English spinners get $7.20 to $10.30 per week; American get $7.07 to $10.30 per week. In 1881 the Lancashire mills paid average wages of $8 per week to men and $5.65 to women. In England clothing is 50 to 100 per cent. cheaper, while house-rent is 50 per cent. less than in this country. English labor is as well paid as American labor. The price of labor is governed by competition. Labor is not protected by any law. The monopolist has high protection on his goods, but free trade in labor.

I have heard enough of the protection cant on this floor about labor. I am disgusted with such hypocrisy. The wages of labor in all industries in all countries are fixed by supply and demand. What solicitude have the rich corporate industries for labor? They have been able to gather unnatural fortunes through the class legislation of Congress, and yet they did not increase the wages of their workmen. Their unnatural gains represent in part the dues of laboring men. When large profits can not be made any other way they begin to cut down the moderate wages of the workingman until they are below the living point, when labor "strikes" become necessary to enforce the demand for better wages to buy bread.

Talk to me about well-paid labor under protection! There is not a protected industry in the United States having well-paid labor. It is hired as cheaply as it can be had. They do not ask, "What can this or that laboring man live for and educate himself and family?" No, that is not considered. They say, "What can it be had for in the labor market?" The protective system has made labor an auction-block. Strong men, with weeping dependents appealing for bread and clothing, charged with 65 to 80 per cent. over the actual value, mount the labor-auction block with competition for the auctioneer. He can make no demand for living rates. He can not name the price for daily toil. The chains of monopoly around his brawny arms tell him he is a slave. The monopolists gather around the auction-block when the auctioneer cries, "Going, going, at $1.50 per day."

The owners of bursting bags of gold, wrung from all the people by a law of Congress—profits never earned—make no bid, and witness the scene with the cold indifference of the black master of the Austrian dungeon. "Going, going, at $1.25 per day," cries the auctioneer, and still the monopolist is silent as the hour before final doom. "Going, going, going, at $1 per day," cries the auctioneer, and monopoly bids him in, counting the profit saved, while the brawny arms implore the mercy of Providence for him and his in this land of overflowing plenty. I turn my head from sickening nausea when I hear it again and again repeated on this floor that labor is well paid under the protective system. France and Germany have protection, and their laborers are not near as well paid as the wagemen of free-trade England, while England employs more men and manufactures more than all the protected countries excepting the United States. The laboring man in the protected industries has no liberty, no rights which the employer dare not invade. His labor is not only bought and sold in the market, but the highest and most sovereign right of American freemen is demanded and held in the hand of the monopolist. When he buys his labor he says, "I have bought his vote. I own his labor and I own his vote."

Is this freedom or human slavery? Does this elevate the laboring man? Does it make him a man? Where is his citizenship? I shall hail the day as one of glad tidings when laboring men can be free, independent, and able to dictate terms equally with the employer, and have the full and free enjoyment of American citizenship. I shall labor for him to bring this grand result while I have a voice on this floor or elsewhere. The workingman has no protection for his own capital—his labor—this side of the throne of grace. Look at the great industries, employing 64 per cent. of foreign labor at low wages, and yet the gilded tongue of hypocrisy talks blandly for American labor. The essence, the oil of this hated hypocrisy burns brightly in all the lost regions below—the far-hidden sepulcher for "man's inhumanity to man."

Hear, oh, ye protectionists, what the laboring men of Pittsburgh, Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, say in their just and righteous petition to the American Congress.

That the present issue on the tariff question interests us more than any other bill now before Congress; that no matter whether there is a protective or a revenue tariff, it makes no difference to us, as we receive no proportionate benefit from it. We have already submitted to a horizontal reduction in our wages of from 10 to 20 per cent., forced upon us by our employers on the plea that they could not afford to pay us our previous wages, while no change had been made in the tariff that could affect them. They receive all the benefits from the tariff, and we have to submit to all the reductions they impose upon us.

Therefore, we are in favor of the 20 per cent. horizontal reduction in the present tariff.

We demand that our rights shall be acknowledged, and that we shall receive our proportionate share of any tariff that may be levied for the protection of the American workingmen against competition with the pauper labor of Europe; that we are not to submit to any reduction in our wages below the amount guaranteed by our proportionate share of the tariff, and that the local competition between the manufacturers shall not be used by them to lower our wages at their pleasure unless the tariff has been reduced a corresponding amount.

The Washington Star comments:

The protected manufacturers of Pennsylvania had better look out. Their employés are rapidly arriving at the conclusion that the tariff protects the manufacturer, not the workingman; capital, and not labor.

Laboring men are largely interested in extended markets for the products of their labor. If their labor products will not sell, then labor must go unemployed. Labor products must sell in the markets of the world to keep laboring men well employed.

There is nothing to hinder the labor of Europe from coming here to compete with our labor. They frighten laboring men by the cry of pauper labor of Europe. Pauper labor is worth nothing anywhere. It is of no value to any industry. It is pauper labor because it can not be anything else on any conditions whatever. I speak by the official reports when I declare that skilled labor in Europe is paid as well as American labor, all things considered; and when the manufacturer says that he wants a tariff to pay labor and that he can not manufacure in this country as cheaply as in England on account of the higher price of labor, mark it down that he is untruthful. But I would give him the cost of his labor in the tariff. That is more than the farmer gets.

The average cost of labor is 17½ per cent. of the manufactured article. The average tariff now is 42 per cent. Cut down the tariff tax to 30 per cent. for the present. That gives him a large percentage over the cost of labor, and with that he should be satisfied. Any industry failing with the cost of labor donated to it ought not survive. The protectionists, when talking to laboring people, hold up the poorly paid and pauper labor of Europe. When speaking to farmers they say: Let us alone now; we will soon compete among ourselves (which is not probable), then prices will come down. If prices decrease by the promised competition among "ourselves," then what will they do about the wages of the poor laborer, to whom they have appealed for protection to keep up prices so that they could pay him good wages?

The defense of protection is founded upon deception of the people, and any cause that can not exist without deceit to uphold it ought to go down. Our working people are told that the laboring people of other countries do not live so well as the American workmen. I think that is true, but what is the cause of it? The only countries in Europe whose inhabitants and resources are enough like ours for comparison are Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain, Ireland, and the Netherlands. Their average population is two hundred and twenty-seven to the square mile. Our population is fourteen to the square mile by the census of 1880. Making due allowance for uninhabitable regions, sixteen to two hundred and twenty-five is a fair comparison.

Now, no man wants to be told that sixteen persons can live better off of a square mile of land than two hundred and twenty-five can. Protectionists try to scare the farmers by stating that their 700,000 workmen will turn farmers, and then farm products will be worth nothing on account of overproduction. In the first place, the industries are not going to stop. Their workmen will not leave them. Our industries are able to compete with any others on the earth. I will discuss this hereafter. But if the workmen did turn farmers the agricultural interest would not be affected. Every two or three years several hundred thousand emigrant farmers come, scatter all over the land, and the farming interest is not disturbed.

The wages of the 700,000 operatives in the factories at a round figure, $10 per week, $500 per year, amounts to $350,000,000 per annum. I said the people pay over $500,000,000 as a tribute by reason of protection. If the people paid these operatives to remain idle, they would save one or two hundred millions annually.

A large proportion of the tariff is taken out of the wages of the workman. That may be strange, but it is true. Many industries manufacture nothing but cotton warp and yarn. Another industry manufactures coloring matter. There are high duties upon warp and yarn and coloring matter. There are many industries manufacturing cotton cloth and other forms of cotton goods, and their owners buy the cotton warp and yarn or thread and pay the duty thereon. The duty paid, or a proportion of it, if not all, comes out of the wages of the operatives who make the cloth. Why? In this instance the warp and yarn are equivalent to raw material, and the wages of labor are always gauged by the cost of raw material.

If the raw material is enhanced in price by high duties, then labor must be cut down, for the manufacturer will not cut down his profits. Again, one industry makes pig-iron, another buys the pig-iron and pays the price with the duty added, and manufactures iron and steel blooms, on which high duties are also levied. These blooms are purchased by the owner of another industry at Indianapolis, and he pays high duties on the price of the goods, and by the labor of his men manufactures from these blooms iron and steel goods of every description. Here the iron and steel blooms are equivalent to raw material, and it is made expensive by high-tariff duties. The increased cost of the raw material or its equivalents by high protective duties is taken out of the wages of the men.

Our workman may get a small percentage more wages than is paid in England, but he works faster and more hours than the Englishman; so, in fact, he is no better paid than they are. Then protection takes a part of his wages back when he buys his groceries and his clothing, which the Englishman does not pay. I fail to see what advantage the English manufacturer has over the American. The chief import from England is cotton and woolen goods. The English manufacturer buys our cotton and wool and imports them free of duty, and pays no more for them than our domestic manufacturers pay. In other words, the American manufacturer buys wool and cotton at home for the same price as the Englishman, and these home raw materials are chiefly used in the domestic manufacture of cotton and woolen goods.

It is safe to say that our class and quality of wool and cotton can not be purchased any cheaper in any other country, or the English manufacturer would not buy them here, but buy them cheaper elsewhere if he could; so these great home raw materials cost the American manufacturer no more than they cost the Englishman. And here again the home market fails to consume our cotton. The disadvantage is on the side of the Englishman. He pays the charges of shipment to England and again pays the charges of shipment to New York of the manufactured article. The American manufacturer has the advantage of the English manufacturer in the cost of these raw materials when you include as part of the cost of them the expense of shipment to England and back again to our ports in manufactured form.

I have shown there is no material increased cost of labor in the American industries; the only difference in the rate of wages arises from the fact that the American works more hours and does more work, and therefore earns the slight difference. American capital is abundant and offers as cheaply as English capital. Our manufacturing machinery is modern and better than any in Europe. Our labor is as skilled and better than that of any other country. Our home markets are equally as good. The per capita tax in England is $14.53. In the United States it is $12.80. Our manufacturers have the advantage of the Englishman in the amount of taxation. If we had free trade our manufacturers could more than hold their own, and they know it very well. Clearly, a moderate tariff will amply protect them. We want no free trade, but reform in the tariff. The first protective tariff was enacted in 1789. It provided for an average duty of 8½ per cent., to continue only seven years, to give "infant industries a start."

Our fathers were not strong protectionists. The present tariff duties average nearly 43 per cent., and we are nearly one hundred years from the economic times of the old "founders." They had just passed through the baleful experience of the class favoritism of the English Crown, and were not willing to establish this hated principle in American institutions. They saw, as we will see, that protection is the worst foe to American labor. There must be a market for the products of labor or it will suffer. Labor is of no value if its products can not be sold. Therefore laboring men are directly concerned in large markets for the sale of labor's products. In this respect their interest is identical with that of the American farmer. England, France, and Germany send the products of their laboring men all over the world for sale. When labor's product sells the laboring man is kept employed. So our manufacturers should, like the farmer, seek the markets of the world.

Protection will not allow them to do this. Other nations say to America, "Take off the high charges you put upon our products and we will trade with you. We are not going to trade with you unless you will trade with us." This situation is perfectly natural. In another way the interest of the laboring man is identical with that of the farmer. If our protective policy is continued we will lose the foreign markets for our surplus farm products, and as a consequence the farmers will stop producing any surplus. The result will be dearer bread and meat at home, the life-food for the laboring man.

Protectionists advise less farmers and no surplus for foreign markets. Agriculture is the dominant business in America. Limit the great surplus, and you can not avoid dear bread and meat to the non-producer, and this result would strike hard, very hard, at the wood, iron, and steel industries, for this business chiefly consumes the wood manufactures and the iron and steel goods. No surplus would also cut off the flow of millions of dollars of foreign gold and commodities to this country, and our channels of trade would lose a potent power and all business would recede into narrower circles. A full foreign trade is an element of national strength. It is large and rapid exchanges of the world's commodities, large consignments coming in and equally large ones going out, ever enlivening the channels of trade, to the invaluable benefit of labor and the producer.

A PROTECTIVE TARIFF IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose protection upon the ground that it is class legislation. The Federal Constitution gives no power to Congress to favor one class of our people over all others. The only power it confers upon Congress is to make laws to raise revenue. A greater power has been assumed, it is true, for the purpose of protection. This offensive doctrine, carried to its legitimate end, transforms this Government into a parental institution scarcely less abhorrent than the repulsive governments of Europe. The best minds there are drawn to the side of the prevailing government by official favoritism, which is the act of the government itself. Class favoritism is universal in all the old governments of the East, and it has always been so. The founders of our Government knew this well, and they put a limitation upon it in the Constitution.

The limitations are that duties shall be levied for revenue, not for protection, and that the States of the Union shall not levy duties upon trade and commerce. The Articles of Confederation left the power to the States to levy duties for any purpose, be it protection or revenue. When the Constitution was formed this general power was transferred to the General Government, and limited to duties to raise sufficient revenue. A duty is essentially a tax. It is fixed and levied by the law itself. At least it is analogous or equivalent to a tax, and the legal rules governing taxation would apply to duties levied and collected. It is settled by judicial decisions that a tax can not be levied and collected for any other than a public purpose. The principles discussed in the Tax cases leave the judicial mind little doubt that they would be applied to the question of duties levied and collected if it should ever come before the courts. In the case of Loan Association vs. Topeka (20 Wallace, 663, 664, and 665) Chief-Justice Miller said:

> Of all the powers conferred upon government that of taxation is most liable to abuse. Given a purpose or object for which taxation may be lawfully used, and the extent of its exercise is in its very nature unlimited. It is true that express limitations on the amount of tax to be levied or the things to be taxed may be imposed by constitution or statute, but in most instances for which taxes are levied, as the support of the government, the prosecution of war, the national defense, any limitation is unsafe. The entire resources of the people should in some instances be at the disposal of the government. The power to tax is therefore the strongest, the most pervading of all the powers of the government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people.
> It was said by Chief-Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax is the power to destroy. A striking instance of the truth of the proposition is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the United States on the circulation of all other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year or two after its passage. This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals as in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.
> To lay with one hand the power of the government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms. * * * We have established, we think beyond cavil, that there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose.
>
> It is undoubtedly the duty of the Legislature which imposes or authorizes municipalities to impose a tax to see that it is not to be used for purposes of private interest instead of a public use, and the courts can only be justified in interposing when a violation of this principle is clear and the reason for its interference cogent. And in deciding whether in the given case the object for which the taxes are assessed falls upon the one side or the other of this line, they must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support and for the proper use of the government, whether state or municipal. Whatever lawfully pertains to this and is sanctioned by time and the acquiescence of the people may well be held to belong to the public use and proper for the maintenance of good government, though this may not be the only criterion of rightful taxation.
> But in the case before us, in which the towns are authorized to contribute aid by way of taxation to any class of manufacturers, there is no difficulty in holding that this is not such a public purpose as we have been considering. If it be said that a benefit results to the local public of a town by establishing manufactures, the same may be said of any other business or pursuit which employs capital or labor. The merchant, the mechanic, the inn-keeper, the banker, the builder, the steamboat owner are equally promoters of the public good, and equally deserving the aid of the citizens by forced contributions. No line can be drawn in favor of the manufacturer which would not open the coffers of the public treasury to the importunities of two-thirds of the business men of the city or town.

This position is supported by other courts of the highest character. In the case of the Inhabitants of Jay (60 Maine, 124) is declared the same doctrine. In the case of Lowell vs. City of Boston the supreme court of Massachusetts asserts the same rule. In the case of Jenkins vs. Anderson (103 Massachusetts, 74) the same doctrine is fully recognized. The same principles are stated in Curtis vs. Whipple by supreme court of Wisconsin (24 Wisconsin, 350) and in the subsequent case of Whitney vs. Fond du Lac the same principle is considered and reaffirmed. These cases declare the doctrine to be that taxation can be imposed for public purposes only. Protection means taxation for individual purposes. It means taxation of all the people for favored classes.

If this power exists in the Constitution, then I submit it can not be withheld in any instance. If this power exists, Congress has no discretion whatever in the premises but to obey the Constitution, and what is the logical result? All that is necessary is for some person to start some business that does not pay, and of itself never will pay, then come to Congress, command it to obey the Constitution, get high protective duties imposed equivalent to a high license to stop the world's competition, and compel his neighbors to pay him tribute. If the power to deal out protection exists, it must be dealt out to all who may ask for it in any kind of business. Such a construction of the Constitution destroys the very object of this Government—equality of the citizen before the law. No reasonable being will hardly take this view of the Constitution.

CLASS LEGISLATION.

Protection, in substance and almost in form, is a subsidy granted to home industries. If Congress donated to the woolen industry 65 per cent. of the value of its annual product, and repeated the donation to all other protected industries, and ordered the same paid out of the public Treasury, it is difficult to see how it would be better or worse than to allow them to collect the same amount stealthily from the pockets of the people by the protective system. The only difference is the method of getting the money. The Government gets money from its people by direct taxation and duties on imports; substantially the same thing. The monopolists extract money from the pockets of the people by indirect taxation.

The tax in one case is direct, or its equivalent, and in the other case the tax is indirect. In principle they are one and the same thing, effect the same purpose, and differ only in the method of getting the money. Therefore protection is no more, no less, than the grant of a subsidy to certain classes, providing they shall collect the money from the people instead of the Government. The subsidy is granted by Congress, with a roundabout way of collecting it, instead of taking it directly from the Treasury. The Government might as well pay it as to compel the people to pay it by law. The distinction is small. We have one infant industry one hundred and twenty-four years old—the glass-bottle industry. Congress by law gave it protection of 66 per cent., and this old infant cries for more. It compels the people to pay $6 per gross for bottles that can be imported for $3.60, and it employs Belgian workmen instead of Americans; yet it cries loudly for protection to pay American labor! Pardon me while I cite a few instances of class legislation.

A tariff of 48.42 per cent. is levied upon earthen and glass ware for the pecuniary benefit of a few manufacturers, and results in taxing 50,000,000 consumers over $14,000,000. Is this class legislation?

An import duty of 40.79 per cent. is levied upon certain kinds of iron, steel, and other metal manufactures for the pecuniary benefit of the few engaged in that business, and 50,000,000 consumers are taxed over one hundred and twenty millions. Is this class legislation?

There is an import duty of 18.37 per cent. on wooden wares, including lumber, for the benefit of a few persons engaged in that business, which results in despoiling 50,000,000 consumers of the enormous sum of forty-six millions and a half of money. Is this class legislation?

Let me illustrate the abandoned wickedness of this system in another way: A citizen pays an average of $1.50 for the protection of the State and county; he pays $8 for the nominal protection of the Federal Government, and he pays $11 for the benefit of protected classes. A family of five persons pays for State and county purposes $7.50. For Federal protection, $40; for favored classes, $55. The citizen, the ordinary family, pay more to the protected classe by laws of Congress than they do to the county, State, and Federal Government.

Statistics show that the industries are worth over five billions of money, while all the farms and their improvements are worth ten billions. The industries are worth over half as much as the whole farmland interest of this country, and still they demand high special privileges over everybody else.

I appeal to the farmers to unite for their own interest, for it is time they spoke upon this subject. Stronger laws will be enacted in the near future to satisfy the greed of the protected classess, that will yoke them down like the Hebrew children, and their appeals thereafter for fairness and justice will be scoffed at as mercilessly as the decrees of Pharaoh scourged these children of Israel. In 1883 the iron industry sold nearly twenty-three millions of iron and steel goods to English purchasers. The woolen industry sold nearly twenty-seven millions of wool and woolen goods in England, and the leather manufacturers sold nearly seven millions of their goods. These sales were made in the home of free trade, the home of so-called pauper labor. When our industries sell nearly sixty millions of manufactured goods in the home of free trade I have no faith in their cry for labor, and I am convinced they can manufacture these goods as cheaply in this country as they are manufactured in England.

England and other countries have prospered more by the system of barter and exchange of the products of land and labor than by the payment of metallic money. This system so largely prevailing in their vast commercial relations enables them to keep their metallic currency at home as solid bankable capital. There is scarcely any limit to trade by a judicious system of exchange, but trade based upon metallic or other currency can not safely far exceed its volume in any country.

It forces our currency out of the country. Importers carry away our gold; exchanges could keep it at home. The protective system destroys unlimited trade in exchanges of commodities. Our exports of farm and manufactured products call for payment in metallic currency. Commodities will not be taken, because our duties stand against them.

It is clear that our foreign trade would grow to great prominence in the commercial relations of the world which this great country is able to give if the protective system did not stand in the way. This unprogressive system out of the way, the system of exchanges would naturally follow, and this country would receive the gold and products of all countries in exchange for our farm and manufactured products, and every industry would move with ceaseless activity, and labor would chant the chorus of hard times no more.

Attention is called to the high prices during the war and to their continuance thereafter for several years as proof that protection had nothing to do with prices, that they are so much lower now than they were then, while the tariff remained unchanged. The answer to that is plain. There was inflation in prices of goods and real estate and everything else, which was due to the wide difference between the values of metallic and paper currency. After the period of resumption the prices of goods and real estate adjusted themselves to the specie basis, and there has been no material change since, excluding spasmodic fluctuations.

Mr. Chairman, I say with regret that the Republican party in Congress has far exceeded my worst apprehensions in its measureless subserviency to the exactions of the monopolist, and I view with alarm the class legislation it holds up to the world. The favored class its policy has built up has become so powerful for oppression that it boldly defies the people, in Congress and out of it. Sir, it is a conflict between right and wrong. This conflict will not cease until the rights of the people triumph. There is no middle ground between right and wrong. Those who favor revenue reform will stand by the Democratic party; those who favor monopoly must stand against it.

The time has come for this earnest contest. If revenue reform drives old Democrats out of the party, be it so; I can only say "Farewell, old Democrats." They ought not remain in the ranks and stab its vital principles to death under cover of Democracy. I do not want them to leave us—no, not one; we need their power and experience in the great battle for reform. I ask them to sacrifice a fraction of their local interests and join the ranks of the old party in this glorious contest. Principle must no longer be sacrificed for policy. The people want to know where we stand. I will stand or fall for tariff reform. In this fight many good Republicans will join our ranks. The independent vote will be with us. Here is my platform:

An immediate adjustment of the tariff laws, so that noneof the people shall be taxed for the purpose of protecting any class, and that no more revenue shall be raised from imports than is necessary for the support of the Government, economically administered, and the payment of all just obligations. This will satisfy the people all over this land.

I thank the House for its kindness.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy very much of the time of the committee in the discussion of the question now pending, "whether we will reduce the tariff on import duties and war taxes," and I would be content to rest the case where it is, as it has been ably and exhaustively presented; but representing an agricultural district, whose interest is so much at stake, is, Mr. Chairman, the excuse for me raising my voice and occupying the valuable time of the committee.

I am not so egotistical as to arrogate to myself the flattering unction that when I shall have concluded I will have given the committee or the RECORD any original thoughts upon this very complex and vexed problem, but I will content myself by following the beaten track and not attempt to blaze a new road; following in the wake, as I believe I will, of the most enlightened statesmen and economists of this and other countries.

Tariff is another word devised for the word taxes, doubtless to deceive the people; and taxes mean oppression and tyranny when they exceed the legitimate demands of government. I know they tell us it is no use agitating the question of tariff reform at this session, because you can not pass the Morrison bill or any bill of like import. I will grant that we can not, and why? Because the whole Republican party, aided by a few protectionist Democrats, are opposed to it, and opposed to any measure that looks to the amelioration of the people, to lifting from their shoulders the burdens that have so long held them between the upper and nether mill-stone; but I tell you agitation means victory, and the people will one day see how they have been wronged and oppressed, and they will arise in their power and might and shake off the manacles that have so long bound them. The tyranny of the tariff is worse, far worse, than the tyranny of human slavery. But, recurring to the word "agitation," I say again it means victory. Why? Because all the great battles of the world that have been fought and won have been won by a continuous, unceasing, and aggressive war.

If the Abolitionists had not agitated the question of freedom would we not still have been cursed with human slavery? It was agitation that wrenched from an unwilling king Magna Charta, which forms the basis and is the foundation of American liberty. It is only tyrants, time-servers, and cowards who deprecate agitation.

The people intend to continue agitating this question until the last vestige of oppression is lifted from them and the revenue collected reduced to an extent to meet only the demands of the Government economically administered. The Democratic party, as a party, is committed to tariff reform; by it and on it we must stand or fall. There is no dodging, no dallying. The issue is upon us, and far better for that Democrat who does not read the handwriting on the wall that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck and he pitched in the middle of the sea. There is no way to straddle the ditch; there is no use trying to sit on one side the fence and lean on the other. The people have made the issue, and they intend that their Representatives shall either fish or cut bait or go ashore. The people are instinctively right. They are patient and long-suffering, but when once aroused from their unsuspecting contentment they are fierce in fight.

A government controlled by one man is a despotism; by a few an oligarchy, and by many a republic; and if this be a republic, then the many are going to rule and control it, and not allow longer a few to gloat and fatten off of their hard earnings.

This bill does one thing if no more; it places the Democratic party upon its ancient platform; it is an earnest of what it would do if it could. While it is not all that its friends would desire, it is a step in the right direction. It shows that we would do what we have professed; that we would relieve the country of its burdens if we should come into power. The bill refutes the oft-repeated statement that the Democratic party has no policy and nothing to offer the people.

What need have we for protection? Why protect any industry? If we protect one, why not all? Who asks the protection of the farmer in his wheat, corn, &c.? No one. Then I say we need no protection for any branch of industry. We are the greatest producing country in the world, have the finest water-power on the face of the earth, and more than 3,000 miles from any competitive market. Is there any reason why the many should pay tribute to the few? Is it fair; is it just? If the manufacturers and their operatives are engaged in a business that is unremunerative, let them seek homes on the broad prairies of the West or seek repose in the salubrious climate of the Pacific slope. Protection means the violation of one of the cardinal principles of our Government: "Equal rights to all; exclusive privileges to none."

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], in opening the debate on the protectionist side of the House, said that they wanted high-priced goods and abolition of the internal revenue. We accept the issue, and are willing to go before a tax-ridden people with the issue thus sharply defined, conscious of the right and confident of success.

Why abolish a system that pays annually into the Treasury millions of dollars, and that collected at less expense than any other revenue derived by the Government, unless it be to further burden the poor people of this country by continuing this new tax? The people must have blankets and shoes; they do not need whisky, brandy, beer, and tobacco; they can and ought to do without these luxuries, but the shrieking winds of winter demand clothes and shoes. The Government must be run, the current expenses paid, the soldiers, their widows and orphans must be paid, and the money must be raised either by taxing the luxuries or the necessities of the people. Which, then, gentlemen will you do? The people say reduce the tariff, but retain the internal-revenue system, inquisitorial as it is.

I do not care to discuss this proposition of taxation in all its economic, philosophical, and statistical relations to our form of government; that has already been done by abler and more competent gentlemen upon this floor and at the other end of the Capitol; but I will say by way of explanation of the present or Morrison bill that the average rate of tariff upon dutiable articles imported into this country is about 43 per cent. ad valorem, and this bill proposes a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent., or in other words, the bill proposes a reduction of 20 per cent. of the taxes now collected from the people under the present tariff.

I listened the other day to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] with the profoundest respect, and when he was relating the poverty of the poor workingman of free-trade England, happy, merry England, I was profoundly impressed. Never in my life had such horrors been pictured with such persuasive eloquence, which was as gentle as the lapse of stream or the travel of star; but then, I thought, is not its counterpart in protected America? Would not Philadelphia, New York, Boston, furnish counterparts to his jaunt to London, Paris, and Berlin? While listening, as I said before, with the profoundest respect, admiration, and sympathy, I was reminded of a preacher who lived in Boston, and who on every Sunday morning preached a sermon upon some calamity and drew a moral from it.

On one Sunday he preached a sermon on the visitations of Divine Providence on those who teach doctrines contrary to His will, the subject having been suggested by the lightning during a thunder-storm on Saturday preceding having struck the Unitarian church, which was on the opposite side of the street from his own church, his church and the Unitarians being very much at outs. He said that the lightning having struck the church and destroyed it, it was an indisputable evidence of the Divine displeasure, because the Unitarians taught unorthodox religion. But by chance the lightning the next Sunday struck his church and knocked it into smithereens, and by the kindness of some of his brethren on the next Sunday he was invited to preach in their church. He accepted, and true to his creed of drawing inferences and reading the Divine will by the casualties of nature, he preached one of his characteristic sermons, and took as his text: "Those whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth."

If the people only knew and could appreciate how they have been robbed, pillaged, and plundered by the Republican party for the last twenty years they would arise as one man and sweep it from existence. Millions have been exacted from them as bounty for their masters, the iron-mongers of Pennsylvania and the manufacturers of New England.

In this connection I will quote a sentence I find in Senator BECK'S late speech:

> Our present system of taxation is the most onerous ever imposed upon any people, and is utterly destructive of the prosperity of our country.
> Our present tariff is also most unequal, oppressive, and unjust. It is grievously onerous upon agriculture, commerce, navigation, ship-building, &c., * * * The present tariff, besides the tax of $150,000,000 a year upon imports, the duties on which are paid by the people into the Treasury in gold, exacts another tax of at least $350,000,000 a year in the enhanced prices of rival protected domestic articles. This can be readily proved by comparing the prices current in gold of such domestic articles with the prices of similar articles produced in other countries. Thus, the tariff taxes the people of the United States to the extent of $500,000,000 a year, of which only $150,000,000 goes into the Treasury, and the remaining $350,000,000 goes into the pockets of the protected classes.

I oppose protection upon three distinct grounds:

First. Because it is against public policy.

Second. It is an unjust discrimination against the many in favor of the few.

Third. It is unconstitutional to collect more taxes than are necessary for the legitimate demands of the Government.

I will not elaborate the first two propositions, because their simple statement is sufficient, and I will content myself by quoting one authority to sustain the third.

Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, says:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.
>
> Nor is it taxation. A "tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by government for the use of the nation or state." "Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes."
>
> Coulter, J., in Northern Liberties vs. St. John's Church, says, very forcibly, "I think the common mind has everywhere taken in the understanding that taxes are a public imposition, levied by authority of the government for the purpose of carrying on the government in all its machinery and operations; that they are imposed for a public purpose."

Another has said:

> The Constitution being the supreme law of the land, we must adhere to it, or we are at sea, without rudder or compass. By its observance we have the only true means of obtaining liberty. Neglect, forget, disregard, disobey it, weary of its commands, and you will lose liberty itself. Obey, cherish, respect it, and liberty will flourish and bless us and our posterity.

The majority of the Democrats of this House have made a record of which all the people have a just right to be proud. We have stood up and contended for relief to all of her people; we have stood upon the platform of taxing the luxuries and not the necessaries of life; in other words, our motto has been "cheap clothes and dear whisky." Is not that a noble, generous, and magnanimous motto? Is it not one that will be indorsed by every mother and philanthropist in all this broad land?

Mr. BAGLEY. Mr. Chairman, it would seem a work of supererogation on my part to attempt to enlighten the members of this House on the subject of the tariff, for I know that I am surrounded by gentlemen who have grown gray in the study of the subject, and whom I am willing and glad to acknowledge as my schoolmasters, while I fear I should prove, even with all the wisdom they have at command, but a dull and unprofitable pupil.

I have always, Mr. Chairman, looked upon the question as one the most difficult of solution that the statesmen of this country have grappled with, and I believe it has provoked more antagonisms and wider differences of opinion than any other that has been presented. Its details are so numerous and its adjustments, to be equitable to all our interests, are so fraught with the necessity for close and wise discriminations and distinctions that it requires a master hand to frame its provisions. It has been the habit and policy of the party in power to continue and maintain the excessive import duties which were made necessary by a serious and exhaustive war until they have become almost unendurable, and the people of this great country are crying out in anguish for relief.

It is time that the policy which has made the rich richer and the poor poorer should be abandoned, and that a policy be instituted which looks to the well-being and the protection of the laboring citizens of this Republic. The slogan of the protectionist has been and is that a high tariff gives protection to American labor. It is a catchword and a fallacy that has served well its turn, and the people have been deluded and have put their necks quietly in the yoke, accepting as truth what common sense and the history of the country prior to the great war proves the opposite.

Sir, it is time now, after twenty years of struggle, that the legislators of this country should begin to look to the interest and study the well-being of the weary toiler for bread. Too long has legislation been exclusively in the sole interest of the millionaire, the manufacturer, and the monopolist. The material interests of the wealthy and those who are amply provided for have received attention, while those who have delved in the mines and in the ditches and tilled the soil have been ignored.

As I said before, I am not an adept upon the subject of tariff legislation, but I know upon general principles that the excessive taxation in an emergency like war is not required in times of peace; and I well recollect that the purchasing power of money was much greater prior to the war than now. It may be true that the laborer in some industries did not receive as much then as at the present day; but it is also true, and I think has been demonstrated, that his wages have not increased proportionately with the cost of living. To what is this inequality attributable? Every man who votes in this House, if he will speak the honest convictions of his heart, will say that it is the present high tariff on imports, and he knows, furthermore, if this tariff is reduced to that point which will bring to us the manufactures and products of foreign lands in fair competition with our own, that not only will our manufactures receive an impetus but the laboring citizens of this country will have a fair chance in the struggle for existence. I believe this proposition is as clear as the sun at noonday when no clouds obscure the sky.

To my mind it is so, and when our ports are opened to foreign nations for the introduction of their products, exacting only a reasonable and fair tribute, this truth will be demonstrated. But so long as this prohibitive system is continued, and the consumer is taken by the throat and the pound of flesh is demanded, so long will the people murmur, and so long will bankruptcy and ruin, closed workshops and factories, with hungry men and women and children ready to obey mob laws, continue to afflict us. Sir, it may seem extravagant language, but the danger is imminent. I say what I believe when I say that the continuance of this system has filled our land with tramps, who are forced to resort to any means for a living.

Such things were not known in the good old days of Democratic rule, when every man received his due, and the son of toil was not robbed of the results of his labor by being crowded to the wall by an excessive tax to overflow the already plethoric purse of his millionaire employer. This state of things is the prolific fertilizer which grows agrarianism, communism, and the like. It is the soil which germinates trades unions and combinations of laborers and workingmen and other associations, who think themselves oppressed by employers, and who honestly believe that they do not receive their fair proportion of the profits of their labor. It is this which provokes the constant antagonism between capital and labor.

The workingman receives his daily or weekly or monthly dole for service, and studies carefully how he shall make it serve to feed his family and obtain necessary comforts. He becomes a financier, and figures with a shrewdness that would do credit to a railroad magnate or a rich speculator in stocks. At the same time he observes another who may be growing rich from the results of his skill, and he gets restless at the thought. He has been taught that all men are created equal, and endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; but he discovers that the equality ceases when capital and labor are in conjunction; that while he is vouchsafed life, and, in a limited sense, liberty, his pursuit of happiness is vain. While meditating over his imagined or apparent wrongs, capital, always on the alert for greater profits, seeing the industry in which he is engaged prospering, enters into competition, and the industry being overcrowded, overproduction results, the workshop is closed, and he is thrown out of employment, perhaps penniless.

Sir, would this state of things ever exist, could it exist, without an iniquitous prohibitive tariff which gives to the manufacturer an excessive and exorbitant profit, and which excites the cupidity of capital and induces it to enter into competition, causing overproduction and consequent overstocking the markets? Sir, with a tariff properly adjusted, and which would give to our own manufacturers that profit which a healthy business should reap, no danger would ever accrue either to the capitalist or the laborer. The two would be brought closer together, the laborer getting the hire of which he is worthy and capital the increase to which it is entitled. No inducements would then be presented for speculative capital to engage in and interrupt the standard industries of the country, but production would proceed in a rational and business-like manner, and panics and financial disturbances would seldom occur. The present tariff is a bribe to capital to destroy certain industries which are overprotected, and, paradoxical as it may seem, the protector becomes the destroyer. The great misfortune of all is that labor, which is the creator of capital, is the keenest sufferer.

Protection to American labor! If so, why is it that the man who is employed in the so-called protected industries is forced to utilize the labor of his wife and children to obtain enough to support the family? Wages should be so adjusted that the head of the family might be able to earn sufficient to obtain the necessaries of life, leaving the wife to her domestic duties and the children to gain an education.

Most of the gentlemen in this House no doubt are cognizant of these facts, for they are apparent wherever these protected industries are conducted. I do not say that this condition of things is applicable to all these industries, for there are branches in which the women and children can not engage; but nevertheless when it is the case they are forced to other occupations to help maintain the family. Sixty cents, or even a dollar, a day is insufficient to feed three or five human beings, clothe their bodies, shelter them, and furnish the other necessaries incident to existence, and hence the mother and children must contribute their mite for the general welfare.

Will it be said that with a reformed and moderate tariff the wage-earners will receive still less? Not with truth. The bottom has been reached through the cupidity and selfishness of human nature; but with a tariff that will reduce the cost of living the poor worker may be enabled to give a respite to his suffering and overworked wife, and to his children those advantages which are enjoyed by the children of his wealthy neighbor. Sir, this very system is a blow at our educational interests. By its operation thousands of children are kept from school from sheer necessity to gain their living, and they grow up often without even the first rudiments of an education, the absence of which is frequently the prolific source of vice and misery. What we need is a system that will teach these people that they are freemen, not serfs or slaves, and it can not be done by crowding them to the wall and making them mere machines for getting daily bread.

As legislators, we talk bravely about appropriating millions for educational purposes, and wisely about educational systems, but you can do but little until you have placed the people in a position where their physical welfare is not paramount. When you have done this they may be induced to consider the question of mental improvement. Mr. Chairman, I have alluded more particularly in what I have said to protected American labor, and I wish to refer briefly to the laboring citizen who is not protected. In this list—I will not say class, for in this sense we should have no classes in America—are the mechanics, the farmers, and the citizens of small means, who generally receive for their labor a compensation far greater in proportion and amount than those who are so beneficently protected. These wage-earners live in ease and comfort compared with the laborer in the mills.

Notwithstanding the great improvements and increase in labor-saving machinery and devices, the carpenter, the bricklayer, the stonecutter, and other artisans are in demand, and are often enabled to command the situation; they do not receive the protection—so called—vouchsafed by the high tariff. On the contrary, they are prevented from laying by something for days of enforced idleness by the excessive tariff which takes from their earnings to fill the already overflowing coffers of the privileged and protected capitalist. I make no war on capital. Properly managed and wisely and justly administered for the benefit of labor as well as for its possessor it is an engine of progress, and wields a power capable of making a people and a nation great. But if used only for accumulation, regardless of the rights of those who are its creators, yet dependent upon it, it becomes a source of tyranny, and crushes those it should sustain and build up. In this latter condition it becomes arrogant, selfish, sordid, and there is no cause so potent to produce this character and disposition as to grant it special privileges and protection. This it finds in the present system of excessive taxation, and hence its advocacy for its continuance. This may be human nature. Perhaps the chief end of man is to get all he can and keep all he can get, but I hesitate to believe it.

When our cupidity is excited, and prospects of great advantage and large profits are in view, moral nature is sometimes debased and runs riot in the cause of selfishness; but with the removal of temptation better impulses prevail, and we have kindlier feelings for our neighbor.

Mr. Chairman, it is time, as I said before, to consider the interests of the wage-earner, the man and the woman whose only expectation in this world is to get enough to eat and drink and to be clothed withal. By the imposition of a high tariff we have ignored their interests and have made them believe, until now, that it was all for the protection of American labor. The people begin to study out, to cipher the sum, and find that in Europe the cost of living is much cheaper than in this country, and that the laboring citizens are much better off there than here. Of course, I expect this statement to be denied, but it is nevertheless a fact, that the laborers under the low tariff are in comparative ease and comfort, and have less of struggle than of highly-protected America, barring, of course, the difference between a monarchical and a republican form of government.

It makes a vast difference, Mr. Chairman, to the man of moderate means whether he pays $5 more or less for a suit of clothes, or whether the cost of maintaining his family is 50 cents more or less per day. If by a reduced tariff he can live for 50 cents less per day, and will use the proper economy, thereby laying by the $150 per year, it soon swells into a moderate little fortune, which produces the condition of mind that makes him a man among his fellows, and he begins to see that he is susceptible of improvement, and exercises that independence of thought which should characterize a free man. As an illustration of the sentiment that is growing and that must culminate in the overthrow of this robber tariff, I wish to quote from an interview recently had with that sage and statesman, Horatio Seymour. He said, upon being questioned, that he believed the two great topics of the day are our carrying trade and the tariff, and with regard to the tariff that it is to excite great interest in the future. He says:

I think in the main the Democratic party is in favor of revenue tariff and the Republican party is in favor of protective tariff. The question is, can we expect to sell our agricultural products to Great Britain free of charge when we say it is our duty to protect the products of our factories by taxation upon imports from other countries?

The Republican party is evidently bent upon taxing out foreign products and "protecting" by prohibition. The Republican party virtually says to England, "We will not admit your products here except as it suits our convenience." I fear England will retaliate.

Question. Is that the reason you are a low-tariff advocate—fear that England will retaliate?

Answer. By no means the only reason. The cause for possible retaliation is what I deplore as unwise and injurious. Besides that is the effect of high tariff upon our own people, and particularly those in humble circumstances. For instance: I have two intelligent men in my employ. One is an Irishman and the other an Englishman. One day they were talking of the relative cost of existence here and abroad. They said it cost them double the amount for clothing here that it did at home. This puzzled me some time, but I came to understand it at length. The goods came here under a heavy duty. The importer sells the cloth to the jobber and he figures a profit on the duty as well as upon the primary cost of the goods. The jobber again sells the goods and exacts his profit upon the amount he pays, which includes the high protective duty originally levied. The goods pass to the small retail dealer, who in turn charges up a profit on the import duty that accompanies the goods. They reach the laboring man at last at a cost double that of the same goods to the British workman. Paints, oils, iron, and lumber come highly taxed. The result is that the man working at $1.50 a day, and who builds himself a house from his earnings, is compelled to sustain the added cost represented by the high tariff imposed by his own Government upon the material used in the construction of the house. The same rule holds good with reference to other items of expense in living. No; it is not alone that I fear British retaliation, but because I see the oppressive operation of a high-tariff system upon the people of this country. And the incidental possibility of retaliation by England would add the further evil of a closed avenue for the sale of our own products.

This conversation between the Irishman and the Englishman is a homely though true and just statement of the protection tariff system. It enriches the rich and impoverishes the poor. And the advocates of this system would take the tax from the non-essentials of life, whisky and tobacco, so as to keep up the protection to the manufacturers and the monopolist. This is what the laboring classes do not understand. Those are famous friends of the workingman, and of the workingman's wife and children, who insist upon taking the tax off whisky and tobacco and keeping the tax on coal, clothes, salt, sugar, rice, and other necessaries of life. The fondness of the people who favor high tariffs for the laboring man is one of the most touching things in the whole range of Pecksniffian sentimentalism.

We are told very frequently and with the utmost earnestness that extreme protection taxes the wealthy citizens, who consume luxuries, more than the masses of the people, who are the consumers of the mere necessaries of life. I borrow some statistics and arguments from a New York paper, which does not advise or advocate at this time tariff agitation, but which is in the habit of telling the truth. It asks this question:

WHERE DOES TARIFF TAXATION FALL?

The total value of dutiable merchandise imported into the United States during the year ending December 31, 1883, was $481,960,362. Of this amount the value of what may be classed as luxuries was as follows:

Art work	$1,756,818
Books, engravings, etchings, &c.	2,951,278
Watches and watch materials	2,221,703
Embroideries, laces, insertings, &c.	12,000,000
Fancy articles, feathers, perfumery, &c.	7,894,156
Fruits and nuts	17,407,807
Furs	5,235,133
Jewelry	900,027
Precious stones	8,550,818
Gloves	3,589,653
Musical instruments	1,656,421
Silk dress goods	16,821,441
Silk wearing apparel, laces, ribbons, &c.	18,280,474
Perfumed soap	105,664
Wines	8,220,322
Tobacco, cigars, &c.	11,442,965
Total	119,034,680

This, of course, includes some articles which can scarcely be called luxuries, such as cheap clothing, chewing tobacco, &c. But for the purposes of general classification they can neither be called necessaries of life nor of the industries of the country.

This leaves a total value of dutiable merchandise imported into the United States in 1883 of $362,925,682, the tax upon which falls upon the mass of the people directly or indirectly, and not upon the wealthier class. The value of sugars and molasses imported last year was $94,867,664, or over $15,000 more than the value of art works, embroideries, perfumeries, feathers, fancy furs, diamonds and other precious stones, silk dress goods and other articles of silk manufacture put together.

Now, Mr. Chairman, such exhibits, if read and understood, should stir the people to the profoundest depths, at least that part who compose our laboring population. It is the misfortune of the advocates of a high tariff that they lose sight of the interest of the wage-earner in their desire to advance the prosperity of certain industries, infant industries, if you please, wherein capital alone is to be benefited, and delude themselves with the cry of protection to American labor. That is a popular sentiment and deceives many, but it is nevertheless the wolf's clothing which hides the enemy that strikes at the object which it pretends to aid and protect.

Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, about the prosperity this country has enjoyed under the operation of a high tariff. Did not this country prosper with a low tariff? Can it be said that there ever has been a time in our history that we have not prospered beyond that of any other people, unless it may be at times when overproduction has produced temporary checks, and panics have ensued, causing disturbances in trade which resulted in individual failures and embarrassments, but which in effect simply cleared the financial atmosphere, and when the storm subsided we have gone on with renewed energy in our progressive race. You can not place such a dead weight upon our people as to crush them. You may retard, you may hinder, and this has been the effect of a high tariff, but you can not stop them. There is too much nerve, too much force, too much enterprise for that; but you can stay them in the onward march by too much protection.

It is as fair to attribute to the system we denounce great crops, bright skies, and universal health as to give it the credit of this nation's prosperity. The advocate of a high tariff argues that our national development is referable to his favorite system, and he falls back upon his hackneyed idea to prove it without proof that it protects American labor. In the words of another, whose statements are to the point, I will say that a high tariff limits us to our own markets. The Chinese wall which it erects around our borders, if it keeps our markets for ourselves, it at the same time limits and restricts us to our home markets. This policy of exclusiveness, which is a relic of barbarism, is checking and impeding our national growth as is shown by the fact that our exports of protected manufactured products has decreased from 17.5 per cent. of our whole exports in 1859–'60, under a low tariff, to 12.5 per cent. in 1880 under a high tariff. If a high tariff attracts and stimulates any particular industry for a time, it is an unnatural stimulation and is soon followed by overproduction, closing of mills, and distress among the laboring classes. Owing to the great energies of our people the tendency is constantly toward overproduction, and the time has come when it is necessary that our laws should be so framed as that our commerce may be unfettered. Perhaps no more striking illustration of the evils of a high tariff can be found than in what has resulted from our national policy with respect to ships. Our laws have since 1865 been framed with respect to our ships upon the most strict protective policy. A person not a citizen is unable to buy, own, or use an American ship, and all the materials which enter into the construction of a ship have been the subjects of the very highest tariff. The result has been that our merchant marine has been almost annihilated. In 1865 the total foreign trade carried in American ships was 75 per cent. of the whole; and in 1881 it was reduced to 16.2 per cent.

But the most startling evil of our high tariff is its result in enriching one class or certain classes to the impoverishment of all the others. From the census returns of 1880 it is easily established that the tariff of that year exacted and extorted from our home consumers over $240,000,000 to pay, and which went as a bounty into the pockets of, the manufacturers of iron and steel and cotton and wool in this country.

By what authority, I would ask, has this or any other nation the right to take from the pockets of a portion of the people $240,000,000 a year to pay as a bounty to another portion? And the worst feature of this enormous bounty is that its burdens mainly fall upon the poorer classes who are least able to bear them. Our wealthiest men are taxed about 2 per cent. of their savings to pay this enormous bounty, while the great mass of the laboring people are taxed about 80 per cent., forty times as much. Here are these facts staring us in the face and yet people wondering at the disproportion between the rich and the poorer classes, and wondering why it is that so much pauperism, distress, and hardship exist among the laboring classes.

Again, upon general principles, there is no justification for a high tariff. It is the continual cause of commercial derangement and disorder. It is an interference with and violation of the laws of nature and morality. A high tariff is born of sin and iniquity and has no justification. It does not increase wages; on the contrary it decreases them. Does it prevent the importation of the pauper labor of Europe, so called? No restriction is placed upon the pauper labor of Europe coming here to the utmost extent to crowd the prices of labor down, while by the high tariff the price of nearly all manufactured goods which the laboring man must use is enhanced to the detriment of the laborer and consumer and for the sole benefit of the manufacturer. Take the countries of Europe today and you will find that the highest wages are paid in the countries having the lowest tariff. England pays its operatives highest wages, and so on down until in Italy and Russia, where the tariff is the highest, the laboring classes are poorest paid and in the worst condition.

Our country never was more prosperous than under its low tariff. From 1847 to 1860 was a period of real and general prosperity, with the exception of a short six months' disturbance in 1857, followed by greater prosperity immediately afterward. In 1860 the country never enjoyed more real and general prosperity. And wages have, considering the purchasing power of money, been highest in this country under a low tariff. The laboring classes are the worst sufferers from a high tariff, as I have already shown. The burdens of it fall heaviest upon them, and the idea of a high tariff protecting the laboring classes is absurd. It protects as the wolf protects the lamb.

Another argument recently advanced is that by reducing the tariff we shall increase our revenue and consequently our surplus. This terrible surplus has been a great bugbear to some statesmen, and it must be admitted that it has had a tendency to create a disposition for extravagance, as exhibited by unnecessary and enlarged appropriations for certain purposes. It is not perhaps conducive to economy. We are apt to be more generous with an overflowing Treasury, but it is a vastly different thing when extorted from the hard earnings of the people from what it is when its creation reduces the cost of living and the comfort and happiness of the people is enhanced.

If this is a danger of a reformed and moderate tariff, I say, let the danger come. We are ready to meet it. I think the suffering we may endure will be mitigated by the comforts and satisfaction that will accrue. We can try to be brave under such a calamity. The time is not far distant when all the surplus created by a low tariff will be needed for pensions, for internal improvements, and for the thousand other demands which will be pressing upon a great and rapidly growing country. Individuals who by reducing their cost of living increase their surplus are not likely or apt to become alarmed, and surely the statesmen of America need not fear a surplus if they will exhibit true statesmanship in its disbursement. We need not quail at the prospect of a surplus in the Treasury if by its accumulation the whole people are to be benefited. It is a matter which need not excite our fears.

The alarm of the high protectionist is apparent from the fact that he deals in misrepresentations and epithets, and not in sound and convincing argument. He claims for his favorite system protection to American labor, which is false and delusive, and charges upon the tariff reformer free-trade intentions. He knows that it is protection to American capital that he seeks at the expense of American labor, and he knows that absolute free trade is an impossibility and has no advocates. He knows that free-trade in its fullest sense would bring upon us internal taxation to its fullest extent, including the income tax, all of which is obnoxious and objectionable and contrary to the American idea of taxation.

The party of tariff reform is not one of free-trade. It is a party in the interest of all the people of America, and particularly of the laboring citizen. It is the party of right and truth and honesty. Crushed to the earth as it has been time after time by fraud and the heavy hand of capital, yet it will rise again and in time assert its dignity and its beneficent power.

Mr. Chairman, I deal not in statistics. I have few figures to prove the correctness of my position. I have only the apparent, palpable truth. It is the cause of humanity for which I plead. I would see the poor man, the laboring citizen, have his rights, for he it is more than any other who rushes to the defense of the country in an emergency. I would have labor receive its just due, and would have no specially privileged classes. I would treat all alike. To do this we must reform and reduce the tariff; we must lift the burden which crushes and oppresses labor, unloosen the bands which bind and hamper our industries, let in the products of other nations, and thereby let out the products of our own. With the whole world for a market, and exchanging products with genuine reciprocity, nothing can stand in the way of our progress, our greatness, our happiness, our glory, and our power.

Mr. WELLER addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. I desire to say a few words in a statesmanlike manner, if I know the meaning of that word, with regard to the great question now pending before the American people. I believe that behind every honest dollar that ever has been earned in the United States there is one honest dollar's worth of labor; and I believe, further, that that is the best policy not only for the United States but for every country in the world to follow that shall set the most men at work on legitimate and honest and faithful wages so as to give, in the language of Scripture, the laborer his hire. I believe that all America is to be the great center in the future of human industry; that it is to be the center of the energies of all the world, and that our country is to be mistress of both land and sea; that our country is to lead the nations onward into that purer and better future when man shall be brother to man the world over.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a motion that the committee rise? He will have the floor when the House is next in committee.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I yield for that motion.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. TOWNSHEND having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ADAMS, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce duties on imports and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. MILLS (at 10 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BUCHANAN: Petition of citizens of Troup County, Georgia, praying for the passage of the Blair educational bill—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. CRISP: Petition of John A. Cobb, M. Speer, S. H. Hawkins, J. W. Wheatly & Co., and others, citizens of Georgia, asking that aid be granted to the World's Industrial and Cotton Exposition, to be held at New Orleans—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. ELDREDGE: Petition of William Bell Post, No. 10, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, favoring the passage of the increase-of-pension bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MILLARD: Resolutions of Henry Wilson Post, No. 68, Grand Army of the Republic, and of Eldridge Post, No. 199, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New York, relating to pensions, &c., for a pension to Enoch Hunt—to the same committee.

Also, petition of F. C. Payson and others, for a pension to Enoch Hunt—to the same committee.

By Mr. PATTON: Petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, asking for pensions for ex-prisoners of war—to the same committee.

By Mr. PUSEY: Joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, relating to swamp-land indemnity—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. RAYMOND: Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Grand Forks, Dak., and citizens of Red River Valley, relative to the improvement of the Red River of the North—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition of N. T. Smith, of Dakota, against the passage of the bill to secure a copyright on news—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorials of J. H. Carleton Post, No. 17, and of Colonel Ellsworth Post, No. 21, both of Dakota, relative to pensions—severally to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. W. E. ROBINSON: Petition of the trustees of Glenwood Cemetery, Prospect Hill Cemetery, and numerous others, in favor of H. R. 5786, to incorporate the North Capitol and Glenwood Cemetery Railroad Company in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. VAN EATON: Petition of more than 100 citizens of Natchez and vicinity, in the sixth district of Mississippi, in favor of national aid to common schools in the States—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. WAIT: Petition of Mrs. Deborah L. Earl, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. A. J. WARNER: Petition of E. J. Hiatt and 248 others, citizens of Morgan County, Ohio, for the restoration of the wool tariff of 1867—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WELLER: Joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa relating to swamp-land indemnity—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petition of W. H. Morrison, D. B. Wirt, and 44 others, against the passage of any amendment to the Constitution to limit the power of the people to maintain a representative popular government; also against the further issue of currency to the banks and in favor of issuing legal-tender paper money instead, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JOHN WINANS: Petition of John T. Fish and others, of H. S. Winsor and others, of Myron A. Baker and others, and of A. S. Spooner and others, to increase the salaries of United States circuit and district judges—severally to the same committee.

By Mr. WOODWARD: Resolutions of Henry Miles Post, No. 47, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Wisconsin, in relation to pension laws—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. YORK: Petitions of citizens of Wilkes County, North Carolina, asking for public schools—to the Committee on Education.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 24, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to state that if it shall be convenient to the Senate I propose to-morrow at 2 o'clock to call up the resolution introduced by me on the 17th of this month on the subject of interstate commerce, for the purpose of submitting some observations to the Senate thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature to the following enrolled bills, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laurena C. P. Haskins;

A bill (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catharine Bullard; and

A bill (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, in relation to certain appropriations required for his Department to supply deficiencies for the current year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRYE. I present the petition of the governor of Maine, members of the executive council, the secretary of state, and some leading cotton manufacturers of the State, in favor of an appropriation, or of governmental aid, to the Cotton Exposition to be held in New Orleans, in Louisiana. Maine is about as far as one can reach from Louisiana within the limits of the United States, and I am very glad to see that Maine takes an interest in that exposition. I commend the request to the Committee on Appropriations, and sincerely myself hope that an appropriation, and a suitable one, will be made. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented resolutions adopted by the E. S. Parker Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Maine, in favor of the passage of such legislation in regard to pensions as recommended by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON presented resolutions adopted by Kenesaw Post, No. 47, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, favoring such legislation by Congress as will comply with the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in relation to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented resolutions adopted by Cary Johnson Post, No. 404, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, and resolutions adopted by P. H. Swigart Post, Grand Army of the Republic, De partment of Ohio, favoring such legislation as will comply with the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions and the equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HILL presented resolutions adopted by Thornburgh Post, No. 2, Grand Army of the Republic, Georgetown, Colo., and resolutions of Veteran Post, No. 42, Grand Army of the Republic, Denver, Colo., favoring the passage of certain pension bills; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the resolution of the Denver (Colo.) Chamber of Commerce, remonstrating against the passage of certain bills in relation to patents now pending in Congress; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco has already memorialized Congress for an increase of the Navy; and

Whereas the presidents of the representative commercial and manufacturing public bodies of this city have asked especially for the completion of the Monadnock, as more immediately essential to the safety of San Francisco: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce does hereby approve and confirm this action, and would respectfully represent to Congress that the isolated and helpless condition of this port in case of war, the ease with which a hostile navy could pass the entrance of the harbor, and the immense risk at stake on such a venture, demands the immediate completion of the Monadnock.

Adopted by unanimous vote April 15, 1884.

HORACE DAVIS, President.
Attest: MORRIS MARCUS, Secretary.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., favoring the passage of appropriations required for the Presidio at San Francisco; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of C. W. Minnin, late private Company I, Fourteenth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, praying that his name be placed on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER. I present the petition of F. W. Brooks and other citizens of Michigan, praying Congress to set aside the United States overflowed and marsh lands of Lake Saint Clair as a preserve for the people. I ask that the communication, if it can not otherwise go into the RECORD, may be read; but if it can, I have no objection to its being printed in the RECORD without being read.

The petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Petition asking Congress to set aside the United States overflowed and marsh lands of Lake Saint Clair as a preserve for the people.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Whereas a bill was introduced in the last Congress to enable the United States Land Commissioner to sell the extensive marsh and overflowed or shoal-water lands in the United States waters of Lake Saint Clair, which lands are one of the most notable resorts for shooting and fishing in the nation and most highly esteemed for the same, the purpose of the bill being to enable private parties to become the owners of this large territory and make the same a close private shooting preserve to the exclusion of all right and privilege of the people therein, which bill was not perfected by Congressional act; and

Whereas two bills have been introduced into and are being considered by the present Congress, the purpose of which bills is to give title and ownership of the greater and most valuable part of the territory above described to private and interested individuals upon plea of old-time claims to contiguous islands, which claims profess to have been founded in the days of English rule; and

Whereas title to the islands proper, if established, should not convey ownership of the many miles in extent of adjacent marsh and overflowed or shoal-water lands, which also represent much financial value and present great temptation to private greed for their possession; and

Whereas the bills introduced to give and confirm title to the aforesaid claimants admit a claim to the territory in question to be existing on the part of the United States: Therefore,

We pray you that no title pass or be confirmed which is not unmistakably demanded by indisputable legal right and justice, and that the United States unsurveyed marsh and overflowed lands of Lake Saint Clair and bordering the divisions of the Saint Clair River be set aside permanently as a national preserve in common for the people of the United States, subject to such regulations as may be established by rightful authority. And, further, we earnestly deprecate the policy which is being extensively practiced, of Government's selling the shoal-water and marshy margins of our great lakes and other Government waters—the people's patrimony—to private parties, to be converted by them into close private shooting preserves, to the perpetual exclusion of the people in common therefrom, which restriction and monopoly will, in the future, be deeply felt as a standing public aggravation and outrage of magnitude, and is contrary to both good public policy and justice. Such favorite grounds for game and shooting throughout the nation are fast passing, and largely have already passed to private ownership and control; therefore we express our belief that Congress should allow such proceeding to go no further, but should set aside such territory as a preserve in common for the people, subject to appropriate and efficient provisions and regulations.

Mr. CONGER presented the memorial of A. B. Carrier, of Frankfort, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the news-copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PENDLETON presented resolutions of the P. H. Swigart Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Lucas, Ohio, praying for the passage of certain pension laws recommended by the pension committee of that organization; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST. I present the petition of the Saint Louis American Medical College, and of a number of citizens of Monroe City, Missouri, praying for the passage of Senate bill 1223 prohibiting any discrimination between physicians belonging to the different schools of medicine as to medical appointments under the Government of the United States. I do not know before what committee the bill is pending. It ought to be before the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. I want this petition referred to the same committee before which that bill is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The petition will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present the petition of James J. Edmunds and fourteen other pensioners of South Bethlehem, Pa., praying that the present system of disbursement of pensions be preserved. I understand that the pension appropriation bill contains a clause on that subject, and I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the memorial of William F. Stewart Post, No. 180, Grand Army of the Republic, Uniontown, Pa.; the memorial of Holt Post, No. 403, Grand Army of the Republic, Fredonia, N. Y.; the memorial of Sedgwick Post No. 37, Grand Army of the Republic, York, Pa.; and the memorial of William J. Wise Camp, No. 8, Sons of Veterans, Division of Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of certain bills granting land-warrants and pensions to ex-Union soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of D. J. Taylor Post, No. 113, Grand Army of the Republic, of White Haven, Pa., praying Congress to enact such laws as are necessary and proper to enforce sections 1754 and 1755 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to appointments to office; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for such legislation as will make up the difference in value between the currency in which soldiers of the late war were paid and gold; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER presented the petition of J. N. Carpenter, pay inspector, United States Navy, praying to be reimbursed for losses incurred by the disallowance of certain of his accounts; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GROOME. I present the petition of 184 citizens of Maryland, resident in Talbot County, praying for an appropriation of $10,000 toward improving the harbor at Eastern Point, in that county, by deepening the channel of the Third Haven River. I will state that the town of Easton, for whose benefit this appropriation is asked, is the largest town on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, and I think the one growing most rapidly in population. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1898) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Tacoma, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The petition of Miguel Capella, a subject of Spain, praying for reimbursement for losses sustained during the late war, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am instructed by that committee to report it back with a statement that Rule VII forbids the reception of a petition from a foreigner unless it is transmitted by the President of the United States. The committee are therefore of opinion that they have no jurisdiction of this case, and they report the petition back with a recommendation that the papers be taken from the files and returned to the petitioner by the Senator who presented the petition.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2098) to amend section 4078 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2240) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Assistant Engineer John W. Saville a passed assistant engineer on the retired-list of the Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2062) to provide for the deposit in the Treasury of the receipts of the money-order system and for the payment of its expenses out of appropriations, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1447) to authorize the construction of certain bridges across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, or Kill Von Kull, and to establish the same as post-roads, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3056) to constitute a bureau of navigation in the Treasury Department, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 738) to constitute a bureau of commerce and navigation in the Treasury Department, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1407) to amend the pension laws, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator is willing, I should like to have the amendments read. That is a bill in which great interest is taken, and if there is no objection I should like to have it read as amended.

Mr. JACKSON. Then the amendments will have to be read in connection with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks that the bill just reported by the Senator from Tennessee on the subject of fees of pension attorneys, &c., be read for information as proposed to be amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is it; so that it will go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary, if there be no objection, will read the bill as it is proposed to amend it.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my request, because I see the amendments are so scattered through the bill that it will probably be difficult to understand it. I can not understand it myself as read. It may be printed in the RECORD as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The further reading will be dispensed with, and the bill as proposed to be amended will be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Pensions is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act relating to claim agents and attorneys in pension cases," approved June 20, 1878, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That sections 4768, 4769, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes are hereby made applicable also to all cases hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions, and to all cases so filed since June 20, 1878, and which have not been heretofore allowed, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. That section 4785 of the Revised Statutes is hereby re-enacted and amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4785. No agent or attorney or other person shall demand or receive any other compensation for his services in prosecuting a claim for pension or bounty land than such as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct to be paid to him, not exceeding $25; nor shall such agent, attorney, or other person demand or receive such compensation, in whole or in part, until such pension or bounty-land claim shall be allowed."

Provided, That when it shall appear to the Commissioner of Pensions that, in addition to the usual ex parte presentation of any such claim and the prosecution thereof in the Pension Bureau, there shall be conducted a special examination by an examiner of the Pension Office of such case, and the agent of record has not for any reason attended the same, and that claimant has heretofore employed another person to act as his attorney or counsel at the taking of depositions at such special examination, it shall be lawful to allow such additional attorney a fee of $5 for each day so employed in such special examination while attending the hearing before the special examiner, together with his expenses incurred in so doing while actually present with the special examiner, to be shown by a sworn statement of items to be made and proven before such special examiner, such account to be made a part of his report, and be paid by the pension agent out of the first payment of such pension as may be allowed.

SEC. 4. That section 4786 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4786. The agent or attorney of record in the prosecution of the case may cause to be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions, for his approval, duplicate articles of agreement, without additional cost to the claimant, setting forth the fee agreed upon by the parties, which agreement shall be executed in the presence of and certified by some officer competent to administer oaths. In all cases where application is made for pension or bounty-land, and no agreement is filed with and approved by the Commissioner as herein provided, the fee shall be $10, and no more. And such articles of agreement as have been heretofore, or may hereafter be, filed with the Commissioner of Pensions are not authorized, nor will they be recognized, except in claims for original pensions, claims for increase of pension on account of a new disability not before alleged, in claims for restoration where a pensioner's name has been or may hereafter be dropped from the pension-rolls on testimony taken by a special examiner of this office showing that the disability or cause of death on account of which the pension was allowed did not originate in the line of duty, and in cases of dependent relatives whose names have been, or may hereafter be, dropped from the rolls on like testimony, upon the ground of non-dependence, and in such other cases of difficulty and trouble as the Commissioner of Pensions may see fit to recognize them: Provided, That no greater fee than $10 shall be demanded, received, or allowed in any claim for pension or bounty-land granted by special act of Congress, nor in any claim for increase of pension on account of the increase of the disability for which the pension had been allowed, nor in any case filed in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions after June 20, 1878, and prior to the date of this act: And provided further, That no fee shall be demanded, received, or allowed in any claim for arrears of pension or arrears of increase of pension allowed by any act of Congress passed subsequent to the date of the allowance of the original claims in which such arrears of pension or of increase of pension may be allowed.

"The articles of agreement herein provided for shall be in substance as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

"Whereas I, ——, late a —— in company —, of the —— Regiment of —— Volunteers, war of 1861 (or if the service be different, here state the same), having made application for pension under the laws of the United States:

"Now, this agreement witnesseth, that for and in consideration of services done and to be done in the premises, I hereby agree to allow my attorney, —— ——, of ——, the fee of —— dollars, which shall include all amounts to be paid for any service in furtherance of said claim; and said fee shall not be demanded by or payable to my said attorney, in whole or in part, except in case of the granting of my pension by the Commissioner of Pensions, and then the same shall be paid to him or them in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved ——, ——.

"(Claimant's signature.)

"(Two witnesses' signatures.)

"STATE OF ——,
"County of ——, ss:

"Be it known that on this the —— day of ——, A. D. 188–, personally appeared the above-named —— ——, who, after having had read over to —— in the hearing and presence of the two attesting witnesses the contents of the foregoing articles of agreement, voluntarily signed and acknowledged the same to be —— free act and deed.

"(Official signature.)

"And now, to wit, this —— day of ——, A. D. 188–, I (or we) accept the provisions contained in the foregoing articles of agreement, and will to the best of my (or our) ability endeavor faithfully to represent the interest of the claimant in the premises.

"Witness my (or our) hand the day and year first above written.

"(Signature of attorney.)

"STATE OF ——,
"County of ——, ss:

"Personally came —— ——, whom I know to be the person he represents himself to be, and who, having signed above acceptance of agreement, acknowledged the same to be —— free act and deed.

"(Official signature.)

"And if in the adjudication of any claim for pension in which such articles of agreement have been, or may hereafter be, filed, it shall appear that the claimant had, prior to the execution thereof, paid to the attorney any sum for his services in such claim, and the amount so paid is not stipulated therein, then every such claim shall be adjudicated in the same manner as though no articles of agreement had been filed, deducting from the fee of $10 allowed by law such sum as claimant shall show that he has paid to his said attorney.

"And any payment to any person or persons of fees under this act in excess of $25 in the aggregate shall be illegal within the purview of section 5485 of the Revised Statutes, the object of this act being to protect claimants from the payment of any greater fee than that provided herein for services rendered them by a person or persons in successfully prosecuting their claims for pensions, which shall in no case exceed in the aggregate the sum of $25 in each case, except as provided in this act for services and expenses in cases under special examination."

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Interior may prescribe rules and regulations governing the recognition of agents, attorneys, or other persons representing claimants before his Department, and may require of such persons, agents, and attorneys, before being recognized as representatives of claimants, that they shall show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to enable them to render such claimants valuable service, and otherwise competent to advise and assist such claimants in the presentation of their cases. And such Secretary may suspend, debar, dismiss, and disbar from further practice before his Department any such person, agent, or attorney shown to be incompetent, disreputable, or who refuses to abide by the said rules and regulations, or who shall in any manner deceive, mislead, or threaten any claimant or prospective claimant by word, circular, letter, or by advertisement.

SEC. 6. No firm shall be allowed to practice before the Department of the Interior as agents or attorneys of a claimant until each individual of said firm is known to and by name appointed by the principal, and the name of each partner shall appear in the body of the power of attorney or other instrument constituting such firm as agent or attorney by their firm name and style; and upon the withdrawal or death of any one of such individuals constituting such firm the surviving partner shall notify both the claimant and the Interior Department of that fact, and such agency shall survive to the remaining partner under such name and style as shall then be agreed upon between the surviving parties. Nothing in this act or in any law of the United States shall be construed as creating or permitting an interest in a pension or bounty-land warrant in favor of an agent or attorney, or coupling with any power of attorney granted by claimant in a pension or bounty-land case any interest in the claim or pension or land-warrant granted thereunder. Nor shall any power of substitution, conveyed in a power of attorney in a pension or bounty-land claim be recognized unless accompanied with the written request of the claimant that the particular person or firm sought to be substituted be so recognized.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2099) for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 274) to pay Hiram Johnson, and other persons herein named, the several sums of money herein specified, being the surplus of a military assessment paid by them and accounted for to the United States in excess of the amount required for the indemnity for which it was levied and collected, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] wishes to submit the views of the minority in this case.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to present the views of the minority in the case reported on by the Senator from Tennessee as Senate bill No. 2099.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the views of the minority will be received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose while the Committee on Pensions are making reports it is perfectly in order for me to make an inquiry of that committee in regard to a bill that is in their hands.

Mr. JACKSON. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the committee are now actually considering that bill. They have it now under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has not heard the announcement of it yet.

Mr. JACKSON. I presume the Senator refers to the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill I wish to inquire about is the bill to pension the Mexican war soldiers.

Mr. JACKSON. That is the bill to which I refer and which we are considering.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill has passed the other House, and has been a long time in the hands of the Pension Committee of the Senate. I hope they will report it soon. I should dislike very much to move to discharge the committee and take up the bill and put it on its passage, but with the explanation of the Senator from Tennessee I rest satisfied that it will not be long before we shall have an opportunity of considering it.

Mr. FARLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 578) for the relief of Dennis W. Mullan, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on the Library, reported a communication from the State Department, addressed to the chairman of that committee, in reference to a proposition made by Mr. B. F. Stevens, dispatch agent of the United States at London, concerning a plan formed by him to supply transcripts of certain unpublished papers appertaining to the history of the United States in the state-paper offices of England and France, to be added to the archives preserved in the State Department, and moved that it be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the Library; which was agreed to.

STATUE OF CHIEF-JUSTICE MARSHALL.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Joint Committee on the Library to report a joint resolution relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall and to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length for information.

The joint resolution (S. R. 80) relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall was read the first time at length, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the two Houses will attend the ceremony of unveiling the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall on Saturday, the 10th day of May, 1884, at 1 o'clock, p. m.

That the Joint Committee on the Library are authorized to make all necessary arrangements for such ceremonial, and that the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to defray the expense thereof, to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and disbursed on the order of said committee.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURPLUS DEPOSITS WITH THE STATES.

Mr. MORRILL. On behalf of the Committee on Finance, I move that the resolution referred to the committee on April 16, in relation to the act of Congress making a deposit of moneys in 1836, be printed for the use of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 2100) to amend section 2971 of the Revised Statutes, relating to merchandise in United States public stores or bonded warehouses; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONAS introduced a bill (S. 2101) for the relief of Nancy Johnson Lonsdale, Bettie Erwin Brockett, and Laura G. Johnson, heirs at law of E. P. Johnson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORMAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2102) for the relief of William E. Woodbridge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2103) to prevent the sale of adulterated food in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SMITHSONIAN REGENTS.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 81) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution, as I think there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class "other than members of Congress," occasioned by the resignation of Peter Parker, be filled by the appointment of James C. Welling, of the city of Washington.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 264) for the relief of F. G. Schwatka and wife.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 135) authorizing the Secretary of War to lease certain lands to the board of fish commissioners of the State of Michigan; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under Rule VIII Orders of Business 249, 250, and 251 appear in the printed Calendar for to-day. It is a misprint. Those three numbers belong to the Calendar under Rule IX. Order of Business 246, being Senate bill 1581, will now be announced under Rule VIII.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was read at a previous sitting.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the committee amendments may be now acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will perceive from the printed order of business that there are no committee amendments reported with the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment on the 29th of February, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would not be before the Senate now until offered. The Senator from Missouri can offer it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer it, then, as coming from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senatof from Missouri offers an amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 2, line 41, it is proposed to insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That all patents heretofore issued, and approved State selections, covering any lands within the old Fort Lyon military reservation, in the State of Colorado, declared by executive order of August 8, 1863, are hereby confirmed; and the rights of all entrymen and settlers on said reservation to acquire title under the homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture laws are hereby recognized and affirmed to the extent they would have attached had public lands been settled upon or entered; and such portions of said reservation as shall not have been entered or settled upon as aforesaid shall be disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act, including lands that may be abandoned by settlers or entrymen.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can state briefly the reason why this application is made as to this particular reservation. This reservation was made a number of years ago, and was supposed to have been abandoned, so as not to be a reservation, and was treated as public land open to settlement and cultivation. Patents have been issued for the land and it has been actually disposed of, and is now nearly all in the hands of actual settlers. It has been discovered that there was an original executive order declaring it a military reservation. That order can only be set aside by an act of Congress.

Mr. MANDERSON. This would not come in under the general amendment that I suggested to the Senator?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. It requires a special provision. We not only exempt this abandoned reservation, but we confirm the titles that have been issued by the Land Office. Already patents and certificates of location have been issued, and we simply declare that the reservation shall be treated as if it had been public domain from the time it was opened up by the Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. In section 2 the committee report to strike out the proviso in lines 31, 32, and 33, and the word "further," in line 34.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, lines 31, 32, and 33, it is proposed to strike out: "Provided, That the said lands shall not be subject to location by warrant or scrip of any description, nor to the homestead, pre-emption, or timber-culture laws of the United States: And;" and in line 34, to strike out the word "further," after "provided."

Mr. CALL. I should like to hear from the Senator from Missouri what his purpose is in that amendment. It seems to me that while it might be very well to protect persons who have made bona fide locations heretofore, or who have a bona fide homestead upon the land, it is not well to continue in this proposed act that permission. These lands are generally valuable.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will permit me, that is the very reason why the provision is stricken out. These lands are all to be sold and they are not to be subject to any of these provisions. Therefore it was useless to put that provision in. The Commissioner of the General Land Office says that as the whole bill provides for sales those words would only complicate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN. I move to add to section 2:

And provided further, That actual settlers now on any part of the Pagosa Springs or old Lewis military reservation, in Conejos County, in the State of Colorado, now entitled by law to take a homestead or pre-emption, shall be entitled to locate thereunder the lands so occupied, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in a body, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions.

The committee will probably not antagonize this amendment when I make a statement. On the 22d of May, 1877, the Executive issued an order, under section 2380 of the Revised Statutes, setting apart one mile square at Pagosa Springs for town purposes, and on the 28th of January, 1879, a military reservation embracing six miles square, but excepting the town site just mentioned. In point of fact, while this stands according to the report of the Secretary of War as a military reservation, it never was so occupied at all. The troops stopped for a short time on the town site, which was created by executive order before the creation of the military reservation, but in a few months were moved over to the western part of the State, and Fort Lewis as it now exists was established there. This was called Fort Lewis at Pagosa Springs, but the troops never have occupied any part of the reservation except the part embraced in the town-site order. It never was really occupied, but technically it is a military reservation yet, and in order to enable settlers to settle on that six miles square it is necessary to have this amendment. I do not think the committee will antagonize it.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have the amendment reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. BOWEN.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that the limitation respecting the right to enter a homestead should be confined to those who under the law are entitled to enter a homestead on that reservation.

Mr. MANDERSON. I was about to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that I had drawn several amendments to this bill covering the class of cases described by him and referred to by the Senator from Iowa, and I will ask at the proper time that the Senator from Colorado shall consider these general amendments and see whether they will not reach the case at which he aims.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that according to the terms of the amendment as proposed any person entitled under the laws of the United States to enter a homestead upon the public lands, though not an occupant of any part of this reservation, might still be entitled to enter upon it. I do not suppose that is the purpose of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BOWEN. Certainly not.

Mr. WILSON. But at the same time that construction might be given to the amendment.

Mr. BOWEN. I think the amendment is worded to cover the point, but I will withdraw the amendment for the time being and offer it later if the other amendments to be offered do not cover the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer several amendments to the bill and ask that they be read by the Secretary in the order in which they are numbered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska offers sundry amendments.

Mr. MANDERSON. They are numbered consecutively.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first offered will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 36, after the word "reservation," it is proposed to insert:

Or settled thereon prior to June 1, 1883, in good faith, for the purpose of securing a home and of entering the same under the general laws.

So as to read:

And provided further, That any settler who was in actual occupation of any portion of any such reservation prior to the location of such reservation, or settled thereon prior to June 1, 1883, in good faith, for the purpose of securing a home and of entering the same under the general laws, and has continued in such occupation to the present time, and is by law entitled to take a homestead, shall be entitled to locate under the homestead laws the land so occupied, not exceeding 160 acres in a body, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions.

Mr. MANDERSON. I couple this proposed amendment with others to the same section having a design to meet the case presented by the Senator from Colorado and others of a similar character.

This subject-matter is one of vast importance to the people of the frontier States. The amount of land set apart for military reservations in the United States, as shown by the report of the committee, is nearly three millions of acres—2,920,580 acres. Of these lands there have been already abandoned by the Government and no longer used for military purposes nearly 800,000 acres. There have been abandoned in the State of Nebraska, Fort Hartsuff, with 3,251 acres; Fort McPherson, with 19,000 acres; Fort Sedgwick, with 40,960 acres, and Camp Sheridan, with 18,225 acres; making in that State alone 81,436 acres of abandoned land.

The effort has been made for several years past by special bills to throw the lands of these respective forts upon the markets, either under the general land laws of the United States or by sale, under such regulations and restrictions as might be made by the Interior Department, but these efforts have repeatedly failed; and I am heartily glad to see that the Committee on Military Affairs have reported by general bill a course through which these lands can be placed upon the market. Of the reservations that I have named, Hartsuff was abandoned in 1881, McPherson in 1880, Sedgwick in 1871, and Sheridan in 1881, and during all the years that have elapsed since the abandonment of these lands for military purposes they have remained unoccupied by the military and practically open for civilian settlement. It is also the fact that prior to the location of many of these forts citizens had already under the homestead and pre-emption acts settled upon these reservations. They were not disturbed by the military authorities but were permitted to remain there, and in many instances within the State that I have the honor to represent citizens were invited even after occupation by the military authorities to make settlement on these lands. They took advantage of that protection which was afforded by the nearness of the settlement to the reservation, and settled there under the invitation and that protection. Now there are parties upon all these reservations, not only in Nebraska but perhaps in all the States having public lands open to entry, persons who have settled under this sort of invitation and under, as they supposed, the protection of the general land laws.

I propose to extend the provisions of this bill by these amendments so that any settler prior to June 1, 1883—and I fix that date simply that some date may be fixed in the bill; I am not tenacious that it shall be retained—any settler upon the public lands who has gone there in good faith for the purpose of obtaining a home under the homestead or pre-emption acts, having the right so to do, shall be protected in his settlement; and the different amendments to this section that I propose, four in number, reach that result.

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. President, I have no objection to this amendment if the Senator will change the date from June 1, 1883, to January 1, 1884. Quite a number of these settlements were made during the last summer and fall, and they would be cut off by the date he proposes. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "June 1, 1883," and inserting "January 1, 1884."

Mr. MANDERSON. I see no objection to that change, and shall be very glad to adopt it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The Senator from Colorado moves to amend the amendment by striking out "June 1, 1883," and inserting "January 1, 1884." The Senator from Nebraska accepts the amendment to his amendment. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope if this amendment is agreed to that the Senator from Colorado will not press his amendment.

Mr. BOWEN. This amendment covers it.

Mr. COCKRELL. This amendment covers all possible cases of merit and right.

Mr. CALL. I think we should be very cautious in adopting this amendment and in the language in which it is couched. This amendment gives to any settler who was upon these lands prior to January, 1884, the right to take a homestead. The effect of that it is very difficult to see. Some of these reservations lie in the immediate vicinity of towns. There is one in the State of Florida, a reservation known as Fort Brooke, which lies immediately adjacent to the town of Tampa; and the town is here and the people of that country petitioning that these lands may be given by act of Congress to the town for school purposes. They were immediately adjacent to the town and necessary to it in a great many respects. If there had been any settler on these lands who had gone there (which was impossible on a military reservation) in good faith for the purpose of settlement I should have no objection to his right being protected, and so if any one has acquired a right under the law in any other respect; but it seems to me we are creating rights by this amendment. We are giving to those who may happen to have been trespassers on these lands at the time named, in actual possession of it, no matter how, the status of right. If they have it under the law we should not take it away from them. If they have it not we should not give it to them, thus creating in the month of April, 1884, a legal status which did not exist until the passage of this bill with the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I heartily sympathize with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Florida, but I do not think that they are applicable to this provision of the bill. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska provides for a case where any person has actually settled in good faith for the purpose of making a home and for the further purpose of perfecting his title to that land under the homestead or pre-emption laws.

This bill was not intended to encourage wrong-doing and trespass upon the valuable military reservations and it does not encourage them, and this proviso of the Senator from Nebraska leaves the question of good faith and the manner of the settlement to the Secretary of the Interior. If men have settled there for the purpose of speculation, or if they have jumped a military reservation in violation of the rules and regulations at the time, they could not have made a bona fide settlement. This is for the purpose of relieving and protecting a large number of settlers upon various military reservations in the great West where they did not know and had no means of knowing that there was a reservation, though there was one. You take the reservation referred to by the Senator from Colorado. It was supposed to be no reservation. Why? Because the Government had taken a reservation west of it and called it by the same name.

The settlers did not understand but what that act abandoned and opened up this reservation to actual settlement. So it is with various other military reservations in the country. They cover an expanse of five or ten miles square. There is nobody living on them. The lands around them are very much in the same situation. There are no marks and boundaries to designate them, and persons go and settle upon them believing that they have a right to settle there; but when the reservation boundaries are surveyed they are within the boundaries. Many of the large reservations provided for in this bill have been abandoned, and there has not been a soldier on them for five or six and in some cases ten years. It is simply for the purpose of protecting such settlers, but not for the purpose of protecting those who may go and jump the lands and attempt to speculate on them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator from Michigan allow the other amendments to be read to the same section, so as to complete it?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 37, after the word "entitled," it is proposed to strike out "take a homestead" and insert "make such entry;" so as to read:

That any settler who was in actual occupation of any portion of any such reservations prior to the location of such reservation or settled thereon prior to January 1, 1884, in good faith for the purpose of securing a home and of entering the same under the general laws, and has continued in such occupation to the present time, and is by law entitled to make such entry, shall be entitled, &c.

Mr. MANDERSON. This is simply to complete this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 38 of section 2, after the word "to," it is proposed to strike out "locate under the homestead laws" and insert in lieu thereof the word "enter;" so as to read:

Shall be entitled to enter the land so occupied, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in a body, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska offers another amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2:

Provided, That said lands were subject to entry under the public-land laws at the time of their withdrawal.

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest that that amendment be after the word "subdivisions," in line 41, as there has been an amendment already acted upon, proposed by the Senator from Missouri, to the end of the section.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose the amendment ought to come in at the end of line 41.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be placed there. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska offers another amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 4, after the word "lots," it is proposed to insert "not heretofore sold by the United States authorities;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause any improvements, buildings, building materials, and other property which may be situate upon any such lands, subdivisions, or lots, not heretofore sold by the United States authorities, to be appraised in the same manner as hereinbefore provided for the appraisement of such lands, subdivisions, and lots, and shall cause the same, together with the tract or lot upon which they are situate, to be sold, at public sale, to the highest bidder for cash.

Mr. MANDERSON. This amendment, followed by one at the end of section 3, is to reach another class of cases. After the abandonment of many of these reservations for military purposes the War Department ordered the sale of the public buildings situated on the reservations. The buildings were sold without the land. Many of them are of a character that forbids their removal, being built of concrete in some instances. I propose by this amendment, and another to be added at the close of the section, that after the appraisement of these lands a certain portion of them, on which the buildings are placed, shall be sold at the appraised value to the purchaser of the building, if he should elect to purchase the land, that option being allowed him for sixty days after notice to him by the Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska offers another amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 3:

Provided, That where buildings or improvements have been heretofore sold by the United States authorities, the land upon which such buildings or improvements are situated, not exceeding the smallest subdivision provided for by this act, shall be offered for sale to the purchaser of said improvements and buildings at the appraised value of the land; and if said purchaser shall fail for sixty days after notice to complete said purchase of land, the same shall be sold under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I offer the following amendment, to be added to section 3:

Provided, That the proceeds of the military-reservation land sold on Bois Blanc Island, near to Fort Mackinac military reservation, shall be set apart as a fund for the improvement of the national park on the island of Mackinac, Michigan, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

In regard to the military reservation on Bois Blanc Island, Michigan, located near Fort Mackinac, in the Straits of Mackinac, the message of the President declares:

Military reservation declared by the President November 8, 1827 (embracing about one-half of the island), and used for the purpose of supplying the post of Fort Mackinac with fuel and timber, having become unnecessary for military purposes, and a continual source of expense to the Department to keep off trespassers (it having valuable timber on it), and the military authorities having recommended its disposition, the reservation was reported by the Department for the action of Congress by letters to the House of Representatives dated, respectively, December 7, 1874, December 31, 1875, and March 20, 1878 (vide Report No. 19, H. R., Forty-fourth Congress, first session).

There is also a light-house reserve on the island.

The commanding officer at Fort Mackinac reported as follows, under date of December 18, 1874:

"There is no improvement on the island by the military. The old maps show Government wharves or docks; they have long since been washed away or rotted down. They were small affairs, and evidently built for the purpose of getting out timber and wood for the use of the post."

A part of the military reservation on the adjoining island of Mackinac was made a national park by act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, which declared that the land—

Hereby is reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale under the laws of the United States, and dedicated and set apart as a national public park, or grounds, for health, comfort, and pleasure, for the benefit and enjoyment of the people.

Section 2 declares that "said public park shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of War," to make regulations, &c.

This reservation has a tract of land of 9,199.43 acres. It is unsuitable for settlement for agricultural purposes and is valuable for the timber, being in the main a rocky island, but the people of that region and the people of Michigan have requested that the proceeds of this sale shall be set apart for the improvement of the national park. It will not amount to a great deal, but this provides that whatever this land sells for shall be set apart as a separate fund to be used by the Secretary of War for the improvement of one of our national parks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. Looking at the amendment acted upon and adopted at the end of section 3 on my motion, I suggest that certain words be inserted. It provides that where buildings have been purchased and the land is to be sold to the purchaser of the buildings, it shall be an amount of land not exceeding the smallest subdivision provided for by this act. I suggest that it should be "not exceeding the smallest subdivision on such reservation," because there might be a reservation upon which it was not proposed by the Interior Department to lay out any town lots, and so there would be nothing smaller than a quarter-section and in some instances not less than forty acres of land.

Mr. COCKRELL. Say "smallest subdivision or lot provided in such reservation."

Mr. MANDERSON. Very well. I ask unanimous consent to make the amendment suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the modification suggested by the Senator from Nebraska will be made.

Mr. CONGER. That should come in before the amendment I offered.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not affect that amendment at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRESPASSES ON INDIAN LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1545) to amend section 2148 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to trespassers on Indian lands.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has prepared an amendment which is satisfactory to him, and I offer it at his request. Immediately after the words "Indian purposes," in line 8, where the bill reads "set apart for Indian purposes shall for the first offense," between "purposes" and "shall," I move to insert:

With intent to occupy any such land or reservation, or any part thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. H. VON LUETTWITZ.

The bill (S. 556) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is an adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to postpone it indefinitely if nobody wants any other disposition made of it.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] reported the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from South Carolina——

Mr. HAMPTON. I think the present occupant of the chair is interested in this bill, and I suggest that it be passed over informally without losing its place.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to its consideration. Let it go onto the other Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

GEORGIA COTTON CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 601) to provide for hearing and determining the claims of the State of Georgia for captured and abandoned property of said State seized by the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GROOME. That is an adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland object?

Mr. GROOME. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill will be reported.

MADISON FEMALE INSTITUTE.

The bill (S. 1130) for the relief of the Madison Female Institute, located at Richmond, Ky., was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] who introduced the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My colleague had the bill passed over informally yesterday for the purpose of filing some additional proof. I hope it will not be acted on this morning, but that that order will be continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

SARAH PERINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased.

Mr. PLATT. I am unwilling to vote upon this bill without further light than I have upon it. Unless it shall be more fully explained I shall object to its further consideration. I should like to have the opportunity, which I have not had, to examine the executive document which is quoted in the report of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

Mr. PLATT. I have no desire to object to it, to throw it into the other Calendar if anybody desires that it shall retain its place under this.

Mr. PIKE. Does the Senator desire to have a further postponement?

Mr. PLATT. I shall be unable to vote for the bill at the present time, and I must object to it if a vote is to be claimed at the present time. I have no desire to throw it over into the other Calendar, however. I wish to examine the executive document which is quoted in the report, as I have not had the opportunity yet to do so.

Mr. PIKE. I have no objection to its being passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

MARTIN KENOFSKY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1596) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky. It provides for the payment to the heirs or legal representatives of Martin Kenofsky of $8,861, in full of all demands for and on account of the claim of Kenofsky for the proceeds derived from the sale of $4,992.50 of gold coin belonging to him and used in the service of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

Mr. WILSON. There is a report accompanying the bill, and before the Secretary reads it I wish to state that there are two corrections which should be made in it on account of misprints. In the first line of the second paragraph in the report it is stated that Martin Kenofsky was a subject of the Emperor of Prussia. That should be "Russia," and a reference to the statutes on page 2 of the report is made to read the act of May 20, 1863, when it should be May 20, 1862. If the Secretary will read the report it will give an explanation of the case and its character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, submitted by Mr. WILSON February 20, 1884, which, as corrected, is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the several petitions, papers, and documents in the case of Martin Kenofsky, submit the following report, accompanied by a bill, the passage of which is recommended.

Martin Kenofsky, a subject of the Emperor of Russia, came to the United States in 1853, and in 1859 settled at Grenada, Miss., where he continued to reside until March, 1864, when he alleges he left his home in order to avoid conscription in the military service of the Confederate States. He was making his way to Memphis, Tenn., then in possession of the Union forces, having in his possession as the result of many years of toil in the line of his trade (that of a boot and shoe maker) $4,992.50 in gold coin. While pursuing his way within the Union lines he was arrested by the military authorities of the United States, taken to Memphis, put in prison, and deprived of his gold coin. He was not tried for any offense, was soon after discharged, but his money was not restored to him.

On May 27, 1865, Kenofsky addressed a petition to Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, stating his case, and requesting a restoration of his money. This was forwarded through Maj. Gen. C. C. Washburn, then in command of the United States forces at Memphis, with his indorsement thereon, as follows, namely:

HEADQUARTERS DISTRICT WEST TENNESSEE,
Memphis, Tenn., May 27, 1865.

Respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War, with the remark that the facts in the within paper are accurately stated so far as I can ascertain. The gold taken was taken a short time before I took command at Memphis, in April, 1864, and went into the hands of General Hurlbut, by whom it was taken away when he was relieved. I found Kenofsky in prison and in irons when I took command, and soon after released him and sent him out of the lines, that he might return to Grenada, Miss. Federal officers who were in Grenada in 1863 assure me that he showed our officers and men great attention, and officers now occupying the post of Grenada assure me that it is known that he was always a friend to our Government.

I think he was roughly handled, probably more so than the facts would justify.

C. C. WASHBURN, Major-General.

With this indorsement the petition of Kenofsky reached Secretary of War Stanton, and was by him referred to Lieutenant-General Grant, with direction for him to require of General Hurlbut an explanation of the subject and a statement of the whereabouts of the gold.

In due course of official routine the following statement was received from General Hurlbut, namely:

NEW ORLEANS, June 22, 1865.

I have the honor to report on the within case, principally from memory, as the records of the Sixteenth Corps are not accessible to me.

Some time in March, 1864, a Jew cotton and gold dealer and smuggler was arrested by the provost-marshal's force at Memphis in the act of passing the lines South with a quantity of gold.

This was contrary to Treasury regulations, the orders of General Grant, and my own orders.

The case was reported to me by Capt. George A. Williams, first lieutenant, United States Infantry, then provost-marshal at Memphis. I directed the man to be imprisoned and tried and ordered the gold to be confiscated to the use of the United States, all of which appears upon the records of the Sixteenth Army Corps.

The gold, the amount of which I can not now give, was sent under my direction by Captain Williams to Saint Louis or Chicago, and converted into paper currency at proper premiums.

My headquarters were removed to Cairo; at that place the messenger in charge reported to me the amount of United States notes the produce of the exchange, $8,861.

This amount was taken up by me and has been lawfully used in the secret service of the United States, for which I am at all times ready to account and display proper vouchers.

The annexed account will show the statement of this particular fund up to the 4th May, 1864, when I ceased to command the Sixteenth Army Corps.

The amount of $5,001, charged to Lieut. Col. W. H. Thurston, assistant inspector-general, Sixteenth Army Corps, was left with him for use of my successor in command of the corps. No successor was appointed, and that sum was paid back to me by him and expended in the Department of the Gulf.

I am satisfied that this man has no claim on the United States, but request that a report be required from Capt. George A. Williams, First United States Infantry, as to his merits.

I am, very respectfully,

S. A. HURLBUT,
Major-General Volunteers.

The Treasury regulation in force at the date of the arrest of Kenofsky having relation to gold coin is as follows, namely:

"All transportation of coin or bullion to any State or section heretofore declared to be in insurrection is absolutely prohibited, except for military purposes, and under military orders, or under the special license of the President, and no payment of gold or silver or foreign bills of exchange shall be made for cotton or other merchandise within any such State or section. All cotton or other merchandise purchased in any such State or section to be paid for therein, directly or indirectly, in gold or silver or foreign bills of exchange, shall be forfeited to the United States." (Reg. XXII, Trade Regulations, September 11, 1863.)

This regulation was issued under and by virtue of the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury by section 3 of the act of May 20, 1862.

But the same act, in section 4, provides:

"That the proceedings for the penalties and forfeitures accruing under this act may be pursued, and the same may be mitigated or remitted by the Secretary of the Treasury in the modes prescribed by the eighth and ninth sections of the act of July 13, 1861, to which this act is supplementary."

Section 9 of the act referred to declared—

"That proceedings on seizures for forfeitures under this act may be pursued in the courts of the United States in any district into which the property so seized may be taken and proceedings instituted; and such courts shall have and entertain as full jurisdiction over the same as if the seizure was made in that district."

The following order was issued by the Secretary of War to the officers and soldiers of the Army in aid of the enforcement of the Treasury regulations:

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 11, 1863.

The attention of all officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States, whether volunteer or regular, is specially directed to the revised regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, approved by the President, dated September 11, 1863, and they will in all respects observe general order of this Department No. 88, and dated March 31, 1863, in regard to said revised regulations, as if the same had been originally framed and promulgated with reference to them.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

General Order 88, here referred to, provided, among other things, that—

"All other property abandoned or captured or seized as aforesaid shall be delivered to the agent appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Kenofsky's gold came within this provision, and the disposition made of it was contrary to both the law and the Treasury regulations.

The claimant was diligent in pursuing his remedy. He commenced in May, 1865, and followed it in all the ways open to him until the date of his death, which occurred in the city of New Orleans, September 29, 1880. After his death his widow presented her petition to Congress for relief. She died on or about February 7, 1881, leaving seven children in destitution. The lawfully appointed tutor of the children and many citizens of New Orleans then petitioned, on behalf of the orphans (who, it is represented, were, at the date of the said petition now before your committee, being supported by the Widows and Orphans' Home of said city), for relief and the repayment to the estate of Kenofsky of the money taken from him as hereinbefore stated.

The United States seems to have received the use and benefit of said money, but not through the methods provided by law. It therefore seems to your committee just that the amount for which said gold was sold, to wit, the sum of $8,861, should be paid to the legal representatives of the said Martin Kenofsky, and to that end report herewith a bill, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom this bill was referred because of the fact that Kenofsky was an alien, made the best examination they could of it, and acting upon the evidence submitted the committee have made a correct report. Upon the evidence, as far as it goes, this bill ought to pass. Still I have the impression very strongly, gathered perhaps from some information that I had about current events in the South during the war, that this man was one of the class of smugglers who passed back and forth between the confederate country and the rest of the United States for the purpose of buying goods in the markets in the Northern States and selling them in the confederate markets.

I cannot identify this person; but I know that in the section of Alabama and Mississippi where Kenofsky was found by the Federal troops men of the class referred to in this report were engaged in those smuggling practices. No evidence is submitted to the committee or the Senate on either side of that question; and it has occurred to me that this is a proper case to go under a resolution of the Senate to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, the first section of which reads:

That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt.

This case it seems to me falls clearly within the provision of that act, and I should be glad if the Senate would refer it to the Court of Claims to see whether this party is entitled to this claim upon the question I suggest. There is no evidence about it in the testimony submitted, but it occurs to me that it must be a claim of that sort. I will therefore move, or if a resolution is necessary to be drawn up in form I will offer a resolution that this claim be referred to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Alabama put his motion in writing, in order that the Chair may see whether it comes within the law?

Mr. CONGER. I was about to suggest that the bill go over, standing at the head of the Calendar until the next legislative day.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII, if the Chair correctly understands him.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that course being taken.

Mr. CONGER. That had better be done than have its consideration objected to now.

Mr. WILSON. I prefer that, especially in view of the question raised by the Senator from Alabama, concerning which a complete answer it seems to me can be given in a very few words. So I have no objection to its going over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 135) authorizing the Secretary of War to lease certain lands to the board of fish commissioners of the State of Michigan was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the proper reference of this resolution is to the Committee on Fish and Fisheries.

Mr. CONGER. The little piece of land proposed to be set apart for the purpose named is a narrow strip of land between Sault Ste. Marie Canal and Saint Mary's River, two hundred feet wide, and ought to be available in connection with the canal. I think if it were sent to the Committee on Commerce they would understand the subject better than any other committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Commerce. The Chair hears no objection, and that will be the reference.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 431) for the relief of Sallie A. Spence;

An act (S. 503) to increase the endowment of the University of Alabama from the public lands in said State; and

An act (S. 1063) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock has so nearly arrived that the Chair thinks it probable that no bill can be acted on between now and that hour. Therefore if there be no objection the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in section 10, line 1, after the word "of," to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred;" so as to read:

SEC. 10. That the sum of $500,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood the chairman of the committee to say yesterday that he would not press that amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. If I had had opportunity yesterday I should have been glad to withdraw it if I had the power; but the disposition seemed to be to speak on the amendment, and so it was left over until to-day.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will wait till that is acted on before saying anything further.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the proper way would be to put it to a vote and have it voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The practice of the Senate is that an amendment reported by a committee comes into the possession of the Senate differing from an individual amendment, and, therefore, can not be withdrawn.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I wish to ask the member in charge of the bill from the Committee on Agriculture if he will consent to a recommittal of this bill. The Senator will notice that the bill now before the Senate does not make provision for more than one-half the subjects that ought to be included in an investigation of this character. I speak particularly of that kind of regulation which should govern the importation of cattle into this country. Let me state exactly for a moment the position under which they come and in which they are held in quarantine. A quarantine has been established in the State of New Jersey a few miles from the port of New York, where all bulk of the live cattle brought from the other side to our country arrive. There stock imported from the other side are impounded, and may be impounded for ninety days.

If, for instance, a drove of cattle should arrive from some infected district in Europe and disease should develop itself while they were at the quarantine grounds, and if that herd of diseased stock were followed by a herd of well animals that did not come from an infected district, that came from a region where no disease had ever appeared among them, they would be forced to go to the same quarantine grounds and be more or less infected by contact with the diseased herd. They also would be impounded for the period required by law, and then they would be scattered all over the Western country. I look upon the present system of impounding animals, not only at the port of New York but at other ports where quarantine grounds are established, as being perhaps the best means that human ingenuity could devise for spreading disease by requiring the well herds to be impounded with those that are diseased. There is no system of disinfection that can possibly be brought into use that can absolutely prevent a well animal from taking disease when required to be fed at the same pasture with diseased stock.

No provision is made in this bill for any case of that kind; but you propose by a large appropriation of money and by twenty or thirty inspectors to undertake to find disease where it does not exist, and you do not reach at all the defects of the existing system which make the importation and spread of disease possible and even probable. You do not touch another phase of the difficulty which I respectfully submit to this intelligent committee should also have been included in this legislation. It is said by other persons, particularly in England, that the embargo placed on our live-stock at the port of reception on the other side is owing to the fact that disease exists. Why not make provision in the same bill for an adequate and proper system of inspection of all animals exported when they leave the different ports of our country, so that they shall leave here with a clean bill of health? Let this Government undertake to say, under authority of law and by a responsible inspector appointed who is qualified to perform the duties and to give a clean bill of health to all animals leaving our ports, that when they leave such a port they are perfectly healthy, that they do not come from infected districts where disease is known to exist. I claim that that would be an important step toward opening the English ports to the reception of our cattle, without the stringent, arbitrary, and oppressive rules which now prevail in this respect.

These two subjects should be included and incorporated in a bill of this character. If the committee will consent to a recommittal, then the committee can properly prepare a bill. It is well known to every Senator that it is impossible to take these subjects and present them as amendments to a bill now pending in the Chamber, because they require a great deal more consideration than could be given by any individual Senator moving the amendments or by the Senate itself in considering them.

The bill is of so important a character that it should be well digested, well and intelligently prepared by the committee, and should cover every phase of the difficulty which now confronts us. The committee could report it back within a week. For one, I will willingly consent that the bill when reported back shall have the same place it now has in the Senate for consideration by the Senate.

I want to suggest to the honorable Committee on Agriculture, and especially to the gentleman who has charge of this bill, that there is a bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER], and now upon the Calendar, which presents a very clear, logical, and proper method for the inspection of cattle leaving the different ports of this country and giving them a clean bill of health, preventing the exportation of any diseased animals whatever. I will also call attention to a substitute which is offered for that bill and to the very able report submitted from the Committee on Foreign Relations by the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] on the 19th of March last, which I commend to the consideration of the Committee on Agriculture and the consideration of the Senate. And I submit in all fairness whether, after having properly examined every phase of the question, the measure of the Committee on Foreign Relations does not present a more feasible, a more equitable, and a juster method of reaching the difficulty, and still equal to any emergency that may possibly arise. I think the bill reported back from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with one or two sections of the bill now under discussion by the Senate, will reach every difficulty, and certainly the Senate will pass such a bill in much less time than will be occupied in the discussion of this imperfect and crude measure which is now before us, and which only reaches one point of the difficulty, and that not the main point.

I ask the Committee on Agriculture to assent to my proposition that the bill be recommitted, and certainly so far as my individual vote is concerned I shall be very glad to aid the committee in getting their bill back into the same position it now occupies, and I do not think the Senate under the circumstances would deny that right.

Mr. VEST. There can be no sort of necessity for postponing the consideration of this bill in order to incorporate among its provisions the other enactment now on the Calendar which came from the Committee on Foreign Relations. While we may pass both this bill and the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations—both relate to cattle—yet the question of quarantine domestic regulations as to cattle in the United States and those in regard to exportation are not necessarily or should not necessarily be considered together.

This measure has passed the House of Representatives; it has come to the Senate, and we can not disguise from ourselves the fact that a necessity arises for some legislation on this subject. My principal objection to the measure has been removed by the action of the committee in the Senate when they struck out what was known as the fourth section of the House bill and the fifth section of the Senate bill.

I never could, as I said before, give my vote for a bill which coerced the States, or which permitted the General Government to enter into the domestic arrangements of the States upon the subject of cattle. I never could have supported any such measure as that; but I say, with all respect to the argument of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] yesterday, that I can see no objection to this bill as it now stands before the Senate. There is nothing coercive in it. It simply prevents the spread of contagious and infectious diseases among cattle of the United States, and the only section which is subject even to criticism is the third section of the bill as it now stands, the fourth section being stricken out. The third section provides:

> That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities—
> Not coerce them—
> to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease.

In other words, if the Commissioner of Agriculture adopts certain rules and regulations, upon the advice of veterinary surgeons or otherwise, he must communicate them to each State and Territory and propose to that State or Territory that these rules and regulations be adopted. If the State or Territory declines to accept the proposition, that is a question for the State or Territory to determine for itself. If the State or Territory, after seeing the proposition and considering it, determines to adopt new rules and regulations for itself, the General Government can not force its own opinion or its own system upon it. It is for the State to act for itself. It is entirely within the construction of the Constitution. There can be no doubt in regard to the constitutionality of this measure. In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, decided by Chief-Justice Marshall, it was emphatically declared that the General Government might propose to aid the authorities of a State in carrying out quarantine or health regulations, that this power was unquestionably vested in the General Government; a very different proposition from that from which the committee has receded now.

The section stricken out was coercive. It said that if the States declined to accept the rules and regulations adopted by the United States, then the Federal Government might go into the State, take possession of the infected animals, slaughter them if it pleased to do so, and override the State authorities. I never could have voted for a proposition of that sort. But here is simply an amicable proposition on the part of the General Government, "We will assist you if you see proper to accept that assistance in extirpating the disease, with superior instrumentalities and superior power on our part," and the State authorities can accept it or reject it at their pleasure.

That is the whole of this bill; and there is no sort of question but that some action should be taken. Recently in the State of Kansas and in the State of Missouri the newspapers were filled with rumors in regard to the existence of what is known as the foot-and-mouth disease. The effect of those rumors in the imperfect and inchoate condition of this subject, with the inflammable public sentiment that exists upon it, has been to inflict the greatest injury upon the cattle trade. It has in the city of Kansas City, where I reside, cost the dealers there hundreds of thousands of dollars; it has struck the market down; and it has arisen principally from the fact that the people, the stock-growers of the country, know that there is no system on this subject, that nothing has been done by Congress or by the State authorities.

This bill, if adopted, will go very far to allay public apprehension. If it is adopted now in its present shape it will simply say to the stock-growers of the country, "We are prepared to assist the State authorities; Congress is ready to do all it can in a proper and constitutional manner to eradicate the disease of pleuro-pneumonia." That this disease exists there can be no sort of question. It exists in the Eastern States, and the very greatest apprehension exists among the stock-growers of the West that it will be carried to the Western States. But a few days ago there was a convention of the stock-growers of Wyoming, representing the largest cattle interests in the United States, and they passed resolutions declaring that there was immediate urgency for something to be done to prevent the spread of this disease.

There can be no sort of necessity for recommitting this bill. We can dispose of it now. We have it now before us in the least objectionable form, not subject to any constitutional objection, and demanded by the public sentiment of the West. It is the easiest and best method to dispose of it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the print of the bill that I have before me is as it has been reported back by the committee March 10, 1884. I inquire of the Chair whether that is the print that is being considered now by the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair is informed by the Secretary that that is not the print which is now being considered.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] stated, as I understood him, that section 4 of the bill had been stricken out.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The bill we are now considering is House bill 3967.

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I have got. The bill that I have before me is H. R. 3967, certified by John B. Clark, jr., as Clerk of the House, and it contains certain amendments proposed by the Committee on Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill which is being now considered was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry March 12, 1884.

Mr. MORRILL. But by unanimous consent the House bill was taken up in lieu of the Senate bill, as I understood at the time.

Mr. MORGAN. This is the House bill, certified by the Clerk of the House, which I hold in my hand now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was incorrect in his statement. The bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry February 29, 1884, and then, as the Chair is informed by the Secretary, on March 12, 1884, it was withdrawn and an amendment reported.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The original bill as it came from the House, as it now appears to the Chair, being referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that committee reported the original bill back amended by striking out that bill and inserting a substitute.

Then, at a subsequent time, on March 10, the bill was recommitted, and the original House bill reported back with some amendments to its text. The Senator from Alabama probably has before him the original House bill as reported back from the committee and ordered to be reprinted, "Calendar No. 345," but the House bill as reported back with some few amendments to its text is being now considered.

Mr. MORGAN. I understood yesterday that the Senate by a vote struck out of section 3, on page 3, so much of the bill as follows the word "disease," in line 23, and that that is all that has been stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct, as the Chair is informed by the Secretary.

Mr. MORGAN. Then all of section 3 of the bill down to line 23 remains in and is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is right, the Secretary informs the Chair; and then the amendment, down to line 40, including the word "district," in line 40, was disagreed to yesterday.

Mr. McPHERSON. As I understand it, the committee reported in favor of striking out the words after "disease," in line 23, down to and including the word "cattle," in line 28.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true, and the amendment was agreed to yesterday; and then the amendment in italics, from line 28 to line 40, inclusive, was disagreed to yesterday.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood at the time—I do not know that I was correct—that that part which the committee recommended be stricken out the Senate refused to strike out.

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is not correct in that. The words were stricken out.

Mr. MILLER, of California. How far has the Committee of the Whole progressed upon this bill? What is the pending question now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 10 is now under consideration. The bill has been read through, and an amendment to that section is now under consideration.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I inquire of the Chair whether the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to recommit this bill is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not advised that the Senator from New Jersey has moved to recommit. He suggested the propriety and appealed to the Senator from Kansas to consent to a recommittal.

Mr. McPHERSON. I move a recommittal of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is in order and is the pending question.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, certain inquiries were addressed by the Senate to the Committee on Foreign Relations touching the exportation and importation of diseased meat and diseased cattle. That committee, under the instruction of the Senate, have taken into consideration the first branch of the resolution and reported back a bill which contains very well-considered provisions, thoroughly considered both by the Committee on Foreign Relations and by the Department of the Treasury, providing certain additional legislation to secure the exportation and importation of healthy, sound cattle and meats of various descriptions. I always supposed that that subject would more naturally go before the Committee on Commerce, but inasmuch as the question involved included some of our relations, with foreign governments, particularly with Germany and France, it was the pleasure of the Senate to send that matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and so that bill was reported back.

I can see no reason at all why that bill and so much of this bill as the Senate may consider to be proper should not form one system. They all relate to the same general topic, and although one relates chiefly, if not entirely, to foreign exportation and importation from abroad, and the other to domestic regulation of this food question, still it seems to me that they would properly form a combined system, and I hope the Senate before we get through with this bill, on the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations or some other Senator who feels authorized to make the motion, will have the opportunity of determining whether they will not consider both these measures together. If the Senate will take that course with it, I would not be prepared to recommit the bill, because I believe that when we come to consider the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations very little objection will be found to it, and that would leave only the part of this measure which we are now considering to be investigated by the Senate.

I cannot deny, Mr. President, the constitutional power of the Congress of the United States to establish a bureau of animal industry. There are a number of bureaus established in the different Departments of the Government which have a certain necessary relation to the governmental powers which belong to the United States Government and which must be exercised through the assistance of Congress, and this I conceive to be one of them, not because I believe that Congress, in virtue of the power to regulate commerce or in virtue of any power it may have even to assist the States in their quarantine regulations, has the jurisdiction over a subject like this within the States, but it must be remembered that we have nine large Territories and the District of Columbia which are exclusively under the control of Congress as to legislation, if we choose to exercise that control. In some of these Territories we have delegated legislative powers to Territorial Legislatures, reserving to Congress, I believe, in every instance, the right of repeal or amendment of the acts of the Territorial bodies.

In this broad domain of nine large Territories we find the great ranges of the United States in Arizona, New Mexico, Idaho, Wyoming, Washington Territory, Dakota, and so on. There are those vast plains covered with grass, which are not occupied and perhaps will not be occupied by private owners for a great many years to come. They are a sort of universal common of pasturage in favor of the people of the United States who may choose to go there and fatten their herds and drive them from place to place over that vast expanse of territory. Congress has the exclusive power of legislation over that territory, and in virtue of that power it certainly may do anything that a State could do for the purpose of suppressing the diseases of cattle or regulating the passage of cattle from one of those Territories to another.

So far as the bill goes in the direction of asserting the power of Congress, which is exclusive over the territory which is under its own sovereign and sole control, I can find no constitutional difficulty in the way of its enactment. I have very great doubt about the policy of the enactment, for the reason that it looks to a specific subject which it seems to me is more likely to endanger the value of our herds and flocks upon those great plains than to benefit them.

I concur in the view taken by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] yesterday and by other prominent gentlemen who have had occasion to argue this question before committees and elsewhere, that perhaps we can do nothing which is better calculated to stir up a false impression in respect of the diseased condition of our cattle than to appoint a commissioner with two assistants and twenty subordinates whose business it will be to search for the existence of diseases or alleged or supposed diseases of cattle throughout those broad plains. I am apprehensive about a thing of that sort. Some three or four weeks ago, when a proposition was brought here to appropriate $50,000 for the purpose of assisting the State of Kansas in the suppression of the foot-and-mouth disease, I felt then, and I so expressed myself on the floor of the Senate, that we were doing more real harm to the cattle interests of this country in that sort of legislation and in the clamor that we sent abroad authenticated by our own apprehensions, to say the least of it, than we should be able to get rid of in a good while, and that we were then inflicting a very serious injury upon the commerce of the United States in this very important item.

It turned out, I suppose, that that was entirely a mistake; that it was a false clamor; that it was something which was not justified by the facts at the time, and that the mistake grew largely out of the inefficiency or else out of the inattention of veterinary surgeons and other men who professed to be skilled in the diseases of cattle. We were informed at that time that the Legislature of Kansas was about to be convened under a proclamation of the governor for the purpose of taking into consideration the ravages of the foot-and-mouth disease in that State. I have never heard whether the Legislature met, or, if it met, whether it accomplished anything, or attempted to accomplish anything, or found any occasion for taking action on the subject. The whole matter has passed away; it appears that the country has become entirely composed in respect of its fears and its apprehension on that subject.

Mr. PLUMB. If it would be agreeable to the Senator to be informed at this point about what the State of Kansas did I shall be very glad to state it.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to know, because I do not know.

Mr. PLUMB. The Legislature of Kansas, after a brief session, at which it did nothing else, passed an act for the extirpation, so far as legislation could provide for anything of that kind, of contagious diseases among cattle, and provided for the appointment of a veterinary surgeon to assist the governor and the other State officials in carrying out the law. That law is in operation and the surgeon has been appointed. I wish to say to the Senator that it is not by any means certain yet—and I say it with a great deal of regret—that all the anticipations which I had about the disease at the time the excitement was at its height were not justified. That matter has yet to be determined. There is great doubt as to exactly what the difficulty is out there, and it is a doubt which has been of very great magnitude to the State of Kansas and to all that section of country.

Mr. MORGAN. At all events I believe the subvention of $50,000 which we were to pay to Kansas to assist her in exterminating that disease has not been passed by the other House and the whole matter has fallen to rest. I am not complaining of the Senator from Kansas that he became excited upon a question of this kind, because it is enough to alarm and excite any person, but I was calling attention to the fact that we are under the difficulty continually of false clamor and misapprehension upon questions of this kind, as we are in respect of yellow fever, cholera, small-pox, and other infectious and contagious diseases that visit the human family, and which are supposed to be imported from abroad.

But we find that the difficulty, whatever it was, was met promptly by the State government; that measures were taken to enact laws for the purpose of repressing whatever of difficulty or danger there might have been among the cattle of Kansas, and the whole country has gone to sleep now. I am very glad indeed that we are in a cooler and more quiet atmosphere upon this question, because we can consider it more appropriately than we could have done under the pressure of the alarm which was heralded through the newspapers of the country and which found its way upon the floor of the Senate.

I repeat that I participate in the apprehensions which have been expressed elsewhere, that if we organize this bureau of animal industry for the purpose of looking out for infectious and contagious diseases of cattle and appoint these inspectors, whose business it will be to hunt up these diseases, and pay them salaries from year to year and make the continuance of their offices dependent upon their success in finding some ground of complaint against the cattle of the United States, we shall be for a long time suffering much greater evil from their reports and their interference than we have ever done heretofore upon any suspicion in regard to the existence of disease among cattle in the United States.

I of course have no practical or scientific knowledge at all on this subject. I must get my information from scientific and practical men, from men who are continually engaged in dealing in cattle. I would therefore take the opinion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON], who, as I am informed, has dealt to the extent of perhaps a hundred thousand or two hundred thousand head of cattle annually for years past, before I would rely on my own opinion upon a question of this kind. I would take the opinion of the brokers and butchers and traders in cattle in Chicago, that great market, and in New York, Boston, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, those great places of consumption and of exportation of cattle to foreign countries, before I would take the opinion of any expert in respect either of the existence or the extent of this disease. We are informed by them, as I understand, that the foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia have never had any substantial or real existence west of the Alleghany Mountains in this country. That seems to be a fact that is established beyond dispute. If that is true, it limits the area of this debate very greatly in respect of what is to be the future effect of our legislation upon that vast region of country lying west of the Rocky Mountains; we can discard that entirely.

I am gratified to believe, too, that the healthy elevated lands of the West and the Northwest and the Southwest, upon those vast expanses of territory that we have in our domain, contribute to the healthful condition of animals as well as of the human family perhaps beyond any other country in the world. I suppose that beyond the Mississippi River and the Missouri River and up in Dakota, throughout all of our vast territorial possessions, there is the most universally salubrious climate to be found in the world. The grasses are fine and fattening, giving strength to animals; they have hitherto raised enormous herds of buffalo and other grazing animals, and now they sustain perhaps a larger number of valuable herds than any other equal portion of the world.

I suppose also, from the fact that we find an enormous percentage of foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia existing in Germany, and in England particularly, there must be something due either to the climate of those countries or to the crowded condition of the herds of cattle there which has produced and fostered these diseases. I concur in the opinion, therefore, for it is a logical deduction, expressed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] yesterday, that the cattle which may be brought from those foreign countries are more likely to get well themselves and become good animals on our Western plains than they are to infect the herds which are out in that country. It seems to me that it must be a rational conclusion that there is wanting in the Territories that cause of disease and of fatality which has so seriously affected the cattle in the more confined regions of Germany and England.

I therefore am perfectly able to dismiss from my own mind the apprehensions which have been so seriously and so boldly expressed by Senators on this floor in respect of the future spread of either of these serious diseases among the herds of the West. I believe that we are legislating so far as that portion of the country is concerned west of the Alleghany Mountains without there being any necessity for the introduction of this new system of espionage and inspection into that region of the world. I would confine the operations of whatever investigations or whatever remedies we propose to administer through the laws of Congress to that portion of the United States where the disease is found, if found at all. Even east of the Alleghany Mountains we are assured that its presence here is due far more to the fact of its importation than to the fact of its having been germinated within this country.

We are also informed by several Senators that all of the State governments east of the Alleghany Mountains have it perfectly in their power, as it is said, to "stamp out" this disease. That is a technical phrase the precise meaning of which I do not understand. I suppose it means extirpating the disease by the destruction of all animals infected with it or suspected of being infected with it. But whatever may be its extent, or whatever may be the nature of the remedies which we shall apply to the stamping out or extirpation of this disease, I have yet to hear a single suggestion from any Senator that any of the States east of the Alleghany Mountains, including the District of Columbia, are in any sense incompetent or unable for want of money or otherwise to stamp out or extirpate this disease.

That brings this question down to a nutshell. There is very little in it, perhaps there is nothing in it except of a dangerous character, when we consider all the rest of the United States and the Territories exclusive of that portion which lies to the east of the Rocky Mountains. Does the fact of the presence of foot-and-mouth disease or of pleuro-pneumonia in the States east of the Alleghany Mountains require of Congress that we should anticipate an epidemic of some kind to occur among the cattle and provide in advance by national legislation in aid of the States?

I concur in the opinion stated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that all that we can do, so far as the States of the Union are concerned, is to vote subvention or assistance in the way of money to aid the States in whatever measures they may see proper to adopt for the quarantine of cattle or for the extirpation of the disease by slaughtering them. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States has a right to go into any State of the American Union with its laws and there enforce, either in accordance with or contrary to State laws, any measure deriving its vitality and power from our enactment, for the purpose of dealing with this subject.

I find in section 3 of the bill, what I suppose to be the remaining part of it not stricken out, the assumption of an authority by Congress that is not justified by the Constitution of the United States, or if that question is one that is not to be debated any longer in the Senate, that is not justified in wise and sound policy. The Senator from Missouri in his remarks upon section 3 of the bill, that part of it which remains, I think has fallen into an error as to the legal effect of this enactment. I am reminded by the argument made by the Senator from Texas yesterday (which I have not had an opportunity of reading this morning for want of time) of the decision made in the case of The Railroad Company vs. Husen, where it was held that the statute of the State of Missouri which prohibited the introduction of cattle from Texas, and I believe also from Kansas, was unconstitutional, because it was the exercise of a power to regulate commerce or to prohibit commerce between Texas, Kansas, or any other State and the State of Missouri. In that case, however, it was distinctly admitted that any State of this Union might prohibit the introduction of diseased animals within its borders in the exercise of its police powers, its power to quarantine. These are admitted and confessed powers; but the legislation of a State in order to be constitutional upon a matter of this kind must proceed upon the idea that the cattle that are to be introduced into the State are diseased or in some way injurious to the public welfare. In connection with that authority let us consider the first part of section 3 of the bill as it remains. It provides—

> That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act.

Senators who believe in the power of Congress to prohibit commerce between the States under the guise of regulating it or under any supposed necessity of prohibiting it in order to prevent the introduction of vice or of contagious diseases, &c., would of course give effect to an act of Congress which would prohibit the importation of cattle from Kansas into Missouri. If Congress, according to the theory that those Senators adopt, should enact a positive law for sufficient reasons to prohibit the introduction of cattle from Kansas into Missouri, they would of course hold that that was constitutional legislation. They would be obliged to do it. I could not, because I do not believe that the power to regulate commerce goes to that extent, and it was never intended under the grant of power to regulate commerce that the power to prohibit it between the States was given to Congress. But I am arguing upon the hypothesis of the friends of that view of the Constitution, who maintain the constitutional power of Congress to legislate for the suppression of cattle diseases or for the suppression of commerce between the States, if Congress chooses to do it. Now, you propose to empower the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of such diseases.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator does not think that suppression and regulation are the same?

Mr. MORGAN. Extirpation.

Mr. BAYARD. Extirpation and regulation?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not. I am arguing this upon the hypothesis that is contended for by Senators who claim that Congress has plenary jurisdiction over the subject, and that Congress may go into any State and pass laws for the purpose of extirpating a disease among cattle there or for the suppression of a disease among cattle there. I am supposing that we have a Commissioner of Agriculture of that opinion, and that we have a Congress and Executive of that opinion.

The Commissioner of Agriculture is empowered by the third section of this bill to prepare the rules and regulations for the extirpation and suppression of these diseases. When he prepares those regulations they become a part of the law of the United States, just as the rules and regulations which govern the importation of goods, prepared and propounded by the Secretary of the Treasury, become a part of the laws of the United States, and they are laws to this extent, that you may inform against a man and convict him of crime because he violates a regulation imposed by the head of a Department under an authority of the character given in the third section of the bill. In other words, the rules and regulations of the Department become a part of the law of the land.

Now take the case of The Railroad Company vs. Husen. Suppose that the State of Missouri desires to prevent the passage of cattle from the State of Kansas through her territory for any reason whatever to market at Chicago. Here are the rules and regulations enacted by Congress; for that is what it amounts to. These rules and regulations, based upon the idea of extirpating disease and preventing its communication to other herds in other States and localities, absolutely prohibit the carrying of cattle from Kansas into Missouri or through Missouri to Chicago. The State of Missouri, in order to encourage her own cattle-growers or in order to protect them against disease or the expectation or fear of disease, enacts a law that "we hereby adopt, ratify, confirm, and place upon the statute-book as a law of the State of Missouri the rules and regulations that have been adopted by the Commissioner of Agriculture."

Then, what have you got? You have got an act of Congress co-operating precisely with an act of the Legislature of the State, both in the same words, both enacted for the same purpose, both co-operating together, for the purpose of preventing the passage of cattle from Kansas into Missouri or through Missouri to the market. We in that way enable a State, by our Congressional consent in advance, to prohibit cattle from coming from Kansas, whether they are diseased or whether they are not, for the Commissioner of Agriculture may very well conclude that in order to prevent the spread of this disease or in order to stamp it out or extirpate it, it is necessary to quarantine all the herds of Kansas. "There is a suspicion that there are some diseased cattle among those herds. We can not eliminate the diseased from the sound cattle, and therefore we will pass a broad regulation that there shall be no cattle carried from Kansas into Missouri or through Missouri into Chicago." In this way you empower the Commissioner of Agriculture and any one State to shut right down upon the cattle trade of any other State.

It may be argued, will any State do as bad a thing as this? Will any State take advantage of laws for the purpose of affecting or embarrassing the commerce of a sister State? I am not prepared to say that they would do such things, but it is enough for me to say when I vote upon a measure that I do not put the power in their hands to do it. If I put the power in their hands to do it and they afterward do it for any reason whatever, it makes no difference how good it may be in morals, I am the one who confer the authority and I am the responsible man for that abuse of power and authority. It is a dangerous power in the hands of anybody, and the bill as it is framed puts not merely the general character of the cattle of any section of the Union into the hands of these inspectors and the Commissioner, but it actually enables them in framing regulations and rules for the extirpation of this disease to entirely shut up the commerce of this country in cattle. Under a regulation of this kind, as the herds from Texas move to the North, that vast body of animal food which is yearly supplying the necessities of the human family throughout the civilized world almost, as it is collected and fattened along in the spring and early summer months and moves to the North—I would naturally expect that the persons having herds farther north that might be infected by cattle passing over the plains troubled with this splenetic fever would invoke the power of the Commissioner of Agriculture to say to Texas: "You shall export no cattle on foot or by rail through our country to the North."

Congress has prohibited it through her Commissioner of Agriculture, and she has the power to regulate commerce between the States. Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, or other States have also prohibited it by a concurrence of action with the Commissioner of Agriculture. We have therefore two sovereignties to consent, in one or both of which we certainly find ample power to enforce their will to repress absolutely the passage of cattle through this country which are suspected by anybody of being dangerous to the herds in the country through which they may pass. I can not but see in that view of this case a very great danger, and one that I should like to avoid. I believe also that it is not a proper, to say nothing of its being an unconstitutional, method of legislation for Congress to adopt the act of a State Legislature not yet put upon the statute-books because one of its public officers may choose hereafter to adopt it and make it a part of the regulations to be issued under an act of Congress.

Now, look at this part of the third section of the bill:

> Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease.

We have a provision in the Constitution of the United States that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, and another, which comes still nearer home to the protection of property, which is that no man's property shall be taken from him without due process of law. Here is a provision for the slaughtering of cattle, and at least an implied provision for paying for them. Under what conditions are the cattle to be slaughtered? Who is to determine the fact that they are in such condition as that they should be slaughtered and their carcasses thrown away, for I presume if they are slaughtered under this provision their carcasses would necessarily be thrown away or destroyed—cremated, perhaps? Who is to determine that? An officer of the Government of the United States, or else a State officer, is to determine it without any trial before a jury of inquest, a body of commissioners, sworn officers, without hearing evidence, without any form or semblance of process of law or judicial proceeding.

We can not authorize any officer of the United States Government today—we could not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to go into the State of New York, the State of Massachusetts, or any other State, and cause animals to be slaughtered at his will and pleasure because he might suspect that they were infected with some disease, even though that suspicion might be supported be the opinion of the best veterinary surgeons of the country. We have got no such power. If we undertake to condemn private property so as to take it from its owner because of its being infected, we must do it at least under the semblance of process of law. We must give the owner a chance to be heard. In other words, we can not declare martial law against the cattle of the United States within the States and send our executive officers out to enforce that law against those animals.

Of course I do not put the cattle of the country upon a footing with human beings in respect of their personal liberty or personal rights, but I do put the right of property upon a footing with any other right possessed by any man in this country under the Constitution of the United States. The proposition I assert is that we can not, without defining the terms and conditions upon which an officer is to act, give him a roving commission to go through the United States and condemn and slaughter cattle without giving to the owner thereof an opportunity to be heard upon the question of necessity or the question of the lawfulness of the slaughter. The Congress of the United States, neither in the Territories nor in the District of Columbia nor in the States, has no power to come to me and to say you shall surrender your property to be destroyed by any human being in the world unless the Congress has first stipulated in a law the conditions and circumstances under which that condemnation and slaughter shall take place.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Alabama, if he pleases, allow me to make a suggestion in this connection in regard to the slaughtering of these animals?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I see no limitation in the bill as to the price to be paid, and one trouble has occurred to me, if the Senator will allow me to state it. There are very many cattle all over the country that are bought at fictitious prices, $8,000 or $10,000. Certain breeds of Durham cattle are bought at fabulous prices. Many of them prove to be barren and are worth nothing but beef prices; yet the men have paid enormous prices for them. I suppose it would be very little trouble, if a person desired to cheat the United States, to give them a bottle of rifled Cincinnati whisky or cocculus indicus, and thus present the appearance of disease, and have them slaughtered as though they were infected. Then they would prove the price paid for the cattle, four, five, six, eight, or ten thousand dollars, when in fact from their knowledge of their condition they would be glad to take $50. I see no guard against that class of frauds in this bill, which I say might be imposed to any extent by anybody who sought to make sale of cattle found to be useless by giving them an appearance of being infected by disease and getting some cow-doctor to decide that they had it.

Mr. MORGAN. There are no guards in this bill and none intended to be put in it. It is not necessary on the theory of the bill that there should be any guards in it, for the reason that we delegate the legislative power to the Commissioner of Agriculture and we ask him to exert it according to his own discretion. Probably it would be entirely unfitting and inappropriate in a bill of this sort that we should presume to say upon what conditions cattle might be condemned and slaughtered, or the manner in which they should be condemned and slaughtered, or what precautions should be taken to prevent the fraudulent abuse of this power, or any other matter connected with it. It is an application of the legislative power for the condemnation of private property, to sacrifice and slaughter, into the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture. That is the whole of the case.

I can not vote for a bill of this kind. If we must legislate to establish a bureau for investigation, and if we want to confer upon that bureau power to condemn cattle, &c., we must prescribe, according to my view of our duty, the conditions upon which that bureau shall act and the manner in which it shall act; and we must give every owner of property some opportunity to be heard in advance of the action proposed to be taken by the commission. It seems to me that the part of the bill which has been stricken out in section 3, while it relieves the bill very much from what I consider to be odious features, does not by any means relieve it of its real difficulties and trouble. While I concede that there may be some necessity for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, particularly as we have these large areas still to form into States—and they are under our guardianship and peculiar protection until that new political event occurs—still I believe that there is a great deal of danger in intrusting to these men the power that the bill confides to them.

I therefore can not vote for the bill in its present shape. I will vote for the bill if it is modified so as to establish within proper bounds a bureau of animal industry. I am willing to give them all the money that is necessary for making proper inspections if they are supposed by Congress to be necessary to be made; but I can not consent to confer upon the Commissioner of Agriculture or any other person this arbitrary power of legislation, which is simply an abdication of our authority on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

PATENT OF RUDOLPH LESCHOT.

Mr. PLATT. I am compelled to be absent to-morrow and perhaps for two or three days, and I desire to make a request before leaving, which is that Order of Business 270, under Rule VIII, being the bill (S. 419) for the extension of letters patent to the heirs of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, may be passed over without prejudice until my return. I do not propose that there shall be any agreement with the Senate, but I desire to make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Connecticut will be noted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41 to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and had disagreed to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

ENROLLED BILL.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 6538) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Having put the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. PLUMB. I understood that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas ask for a division on the question?

Mr. PLUMB. No, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ayes have it, and the bill is recommitted.

Mr. PLUMB. I was on the floor, and the Chair had recognized me I think. I was about to make some remarks on the question pending the declaration of the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had fully stated the question, and asked the Senate if it was ready for the question, after which the question was put. If the Senator chooses the Chair will entertain a demand for a division, and that will leave the question open to debate, but without such demand debate is not in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I gave way to the Senator from Connecticut, and while I so gave way the Senator's colleague engaged me for a moment. I supposed the matter under consideration was that presented to the Senate by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was of the same opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. While the Chair remembers distinctly that the Senator from Kansas rose and addressed the Chair, when the Senator from Connecticut had ceased to speak the Chair stated the question, and asked if the Senate was ready for the question, and after a pause put the question. It is competent for the Senator from Kansas now to ask for a division on the question.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it not competent for me to address the Senate pending the division?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not. A division must be demanded, as the result had been announced.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered as if the question had not been taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is open to debate.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, the proposition to recommit the bill would have the effect undoubtedly, if carried, to destroy it. It is not made by any one friendly to the bill, but by a Senator who has confessed that he is opposed to it, and has stated very succinctly his reasons for being opposed to it. If it should be recommitted I think it would be practically the expression of the Senate that no such bill as this would be entertained favorably by the Senate at this session, and the committee, I have no doubt, would consider itself instructed to that effect. Therefore, at the proper time I shall have no objection to having the sense of the Senate tested upon this question by the vote taken upon the motion to recommit.

One of the arguments used against the bill is that it is unlimited on the part of the Agricultural Bureau (which seems to have excited the ire of certain members of this body) to give something to do upon the part of certain veterinary surgeons to get a living in their calling out of the United States Treasury. It is a conspiracy, according to the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New Jersey, having just about that scope. In that conspiracy there has been enlisted not only the House of Representatives, which after a debate of several days passed the bill, the Committee on Agriculture which reported it to the Senate, and the Senate itself substantially, but more than that, every agricultural association almost in the entire country, the Legislatures of a number of great States, the Stock-Growers' Association of the United States, under whose auspices this bill was drawn, and all these great interests have entered into this conspiracy. This conspiracy exists, having the main purpose, according to the charges that have been made, of simply giving employment to twenty veterinary surgeons and a couple of other officers to be employed under the terms of the bill. It is a good deal of a conspiracy, but it is for a very immaterial and ignoble object if the conspiracy exists.

This subject has been before the stock-growing people of the United States and before all the people of the United States for a number of years. The Senator from Texas dwelt with great force upon the fact that it had twice failed to pass the Senate. I have great respect for this body and shall have for some time to come, I have no doubt; but I fail to see that that has anything to do with this question. The Senate has frequently failed to pass measures that were for the benefit of the body of the people of the United States. It has sometimes done things that it felt subsequently called upon to undo. While the Senate has acted thus hesitatingly and thus adversely, the tide has constantly risen outside, and I venture to say to-day that there is not an intelligent stock-grower in the United States who is not in favor of Congress legislating upon this important question, and if he differs with the bill at all, it is substantially because it does not go far enough.

The Legislature of the State of New York as late as last January passed resolutions favoring the enactment of a law to carry into effect the recommendations of the Treasury Cattle Commission which so excited the ire of the Senator from Texas yesterday, stringent as they are, going much further than the bill goes. The Wyoming Stock-Growers' Association passed resolutions indorsing this bill. The Stock-Growers' Association of New Mexico have done the same thing. The New York Stock-Growers' Association which met in January last met largely for the purpose of formulating the opinion of that important and intelligent body of men upon this question. They sent a committee here which substantially drew the bill before the Senate, with the addition of the fifth section, which has been stricken out. These men believe that a measure of this kind is necessary for the great interest which they represent, and it has not been described by the Senator from Texas or any other Senator on this floor as a matter of greater magnitude than it really is.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. I propound this question to the Senator from Kansas: Do you find in the resolutions of the Legislature of any State or any body of stock-raisers or any assemblage interested in this question, that any demand has ever been made to Congress to include the so-called splenetic or Texas fever in any legislation that they have asked for?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know that Texas fever has been dignified by mention, but it will get some before this debate is over that will be satisfactory I hope to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator for a frank answer to my question.

Mr. PLUMB. The Legislature of the State of New York adopted a resolution calling upon Congress to pass a bill to carry out the recommendations of the Treasury Cattle Commission, which were to the effect that Texas cattle should not during six months in the year be permitted to go out of that State.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will permit me, I have never heard of that resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York.

Mr. PLUMB. There has been a good deal of useful information abroad in this land which I presume the Senator from Texas has not heard of.

Mr. COKE. I will state that in all the resolutions of all the different bodies recited in the report of the committee of the other House which reported this bill not a single one of them asked for legislation against the Texas or splenetic fever, but only against pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill does not mention Texas fever. It mentions "contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases," and if Texas fever is not a communicable disease nor a contagious disease then the bill does not apply to it. In addition to that the Iowa Improved-Stock Breeders' Associations have petitioned for the passage of this bill. The Legislature of the State of Iowa have done the same thing. The Stock-Growers' Association of the State of Kansas, embracing representatives located in every county in that State, thoroughly representative of the stock interests of that State and of as much importance to the people of that State as the interest of Texas cattle is to the people of Texas, have also petitioned for the passage of this bill.

Now, who opposes the bill? I do not mean on constitutional grounds, but on interested grounds. The Senator from Texas and a few men interested in the commission business in cattle, men who would just as soon sell a diseased animal as a sound one, because the commission is just the same, which is 12½ cents a head. We have had here the spectacle of men who are interested in the selling of diseased cattle, or of cattle without reference to whether they are diseased or not, sending an attorney here, and I have a telegram from him on my desk in which he represents himself as being a sort of high joint commission; and he says he is arbitrating this question with somebody outside, and will I not please withhold this bill until he and the man he is conferring with have agreed upon something which they shall consent that Congress may pass. I have here a letter from the president of the stock-yard association of Kansas City, which I will put against the declaration of the stockmen of Chicago who have been quoted, and I may say for that body of men, represented by the manager of the association, that they do not want to sell diseased cattle to the people of this country or any other. They are interested in a trade which is legitimate; they are interested in maintaining it as a legitimate trade, and they handle as many Texas cattle as any other stock-yards in the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the paper read?

Mr. PLUMB. I should be glad to have the paper read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the paper.

The Secretary read as follows:

KANSAS CITY STOCK-YARD COMPANY,
GENERAL MANAGER'S OFFICE,
Kansas City, March 10, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I duly received a copy of the Hatch bill as passed by the House, also your letter of 4th instant, for which I am obliged. I think your views as to the importance of a stringent law for quarantining and stamping out infectious diseases among live-stock entirely correct. There was an effort made to have the Kansas City Stock-Yards and the people doing business there make a movement similar to that made at the Union Stock-Yards, Chicago, where, as you are no doubt aware, a series of resolutions was passed in opposition to this bill. I thought at the time that the Chicago people had made a mistake, and opposed anything of the kind being done here as being against the public policy and as being opposed to the real interests of the great majority of the stockmen who did business with us. The existence at this time of an infectious disease among cattle in the vicinity of Neosha Falls shows the necessity of a law which will provide prompt and decisive means for stamping out such diseases, and in view of the immense interest which all of the States in this section of the country have in the live-stock business, I shall be very glad if the present bill, with any necessary amendments, becomes a law of the land.

Yours, truly,

C. F. MORSE, General Manager.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB.

Mr. PLUMB. I will ask that the memorial of the committee of the national stock convention that met in Chicago in November, 1883, be inserted in the RECORD without being read, and also the resolutions of the Wyoming Stock-Growers' Association, and the resolutions of the New Mexican Stock-Growers' Association.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the papers referred to by the Senator will be inserted in the RECORD.

The papers are as follows:

A memorial of the committee of the national stock convention held in Chicago, November, 1883.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners respectfully set forth that at a national convention of live-stock breeders of the United States, representing twenty-two of the principal stock-growing States and Territories, held in the city of Chicago, November 16, 1883, they were appointed a committee for the purpose of presenting to your honorable bodies a statement of the losses which the live-stock interests of the country suffer by reason of the restrictive regulations now enforced by foreign governments against the importation of American live-stock and meat products into their respective countries.

We believe that these regulations are, to a great extent, inspired by motives other than those publicly assigned. It is claimed that our cattle are infected with a disease known as contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and that our swine are diseased in various ways—but more particularly with trichinosis. It is further alleged that we have no adequate system of inspection of either live-stock or dead-meat products. While the facts do not fully bear out these allegations, yet they contain a sufficient amount of truth to give them a degree of plausibility.

The facts are briefly these: The disease of lung-plague exists to a limited extent in circumscribed localities along the Atlantic seaboard, where it was first introduced by importation from Great Britain and Holland. Various State laws have been passed for the suppression of this disease and several hundred thousand dollars expended, but owing to the lack of united action by the several States, and the difficulty of regulating by State enactments the commerce between the States, it has been impossible so far to entirely eradicate the disease, except in the single State of Massachusetts, which took immediate action on discovering the disease, and by prompt measures, at an expenditure of about $100,000, successfully eradicated it.

There is also a certain amount of disease existing among the swine of the United States, but certainly to not nearly so great an extent as is represented abroad. The statistics of our export trade show that we are now annually losing millions of dollars by reason of these restrictions. The number of neat cattle in the United States, as estimated by the census of 1880, is 41,171,000, representing an estimated value of $1,250,000,000. The number of swine is 43,000,000, representing an estimated value of $300,000,000. Our export of live-stock and meat products during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, aggregated $120,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, they aggregate only $107,000,000, showing a decrease of $13,000,000. This great and rapidly growing interest is not only seriously embarrassed by reason of the restrictive regulations imposed by foreign governments against our meats, but the actual existence of the cattle interest is imperiled by the prevalence of contagious pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague, which prevails, as yet to only a limited extent, as hereinbefore stated.

In proof of this strong statement it is only necessary to cite the case of Australia, where formerly vast herds of cattle roamed the extensive plains of that country as they now do the plains of our own western frontier. In the year 1858 a single cow infected with the lung-plague was imported into that country from England, and from that one animal the disease extended to the ranges of the interior and entirely destroyed the herds of whole districts of country, so that the raising of cattle was abandoned in consequence. The same state of affairs occurred in South Africa. We cite these cases to show what would be the result of the infection of our own western ranges now teeming with millions of cattle. That they have not already become affected is due solely to the fact that the traffic in live-stock has been almost entirely from the West to the East, except during the year 1880, when a large trade in eastern dairy calves sprang up between the West and the East. The State of Illinois, forseeing the fatal effects likely to result from this trade, promptly passed a law prohibiting the traffic in such calves within her territory, thereby substantially breaking up the dangerous traffic.

In consequence of the restrictions which Great Britain imposes upon our exports of live cattle, animals taken from this country bring an average of $15 per head less than if the same class of cattle were exported from Canada, where a rigid examination of cattle is enforced and no disease is known to exist, thus placing our cattle industry at a serious disadvantage in competition with countries against which no restrictions are imposed, and tending constantly to lessen the aggregate of our export. A much greater percentage of losses is sustained by reason of the restrictions imposed by foreign countries upon our pork products.

For fuller and more complete information we respectfully refer you to the reports of the United States Department of Agriculture and of the United States Treasury Cattle Commission.

In view of losses already sustained and of the yet greater dangers menacing us, we most earnestly recommend that your honorable bodies enact such laws as will not only relieve us from the unjust suspicion which attaches to our live-stock and meat products abroad, but that you will also take proper measures to provide for the extinction of the disease of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, which can only be done by the slaughter of all infected cattle and the thorough disinfection of infected premises.

The United States Treasury Cattle Commission, who have made a very thorough examination of the subject, estimates the expense of such a measure at $1,500,000. Large as this sum is, it is a mere trifle in comparison with the losses already sustained. In our opinion not more than $500,000 need be made immediately available, and it is to be hoped that after the work has been properly inaugurated it may be found that a much smaller sum than that first named may be sufficient; but in any case we wish to particularly urge upon you the necessity of immediate, thorough, and complete work. We further respectfully recommend, with a view to removing the prejudice of our foreign customers, whose trade it is desirable for this country to retain, that a rigid system of inspection of all meat products for foreign export be provided for and enforced, the expense of such inspection to be borne by the exporter.

In order that the States whose Legislatures are now in session may take immediate measures to co-operate with the provisions of a bill to carry out these recommendations, your early consideration of this measure is earnestly urged.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

WYOMING STOCK-GROWERS' ASSOCIATION, Cheyenne, April 8, 1884.

* * * * * * *

On motion of Mr. John Clay, the financial agent of the Wyoming Cattle Company, which owns one of the largest herds in the world, the following resolutions were received with immense applause and unanimously adopted:

"Whereas it has been actually demonstrated to this association that contagious pleuro-pneumonia actually exists in certain of the Atlantic States, which demands national legislation for its suppression; and

"Whereas a committee was sent to Washington by the national cattle-breeders' convention which met in Chicago in November, 1883, which committee prepared a careful and conservative bill covering all the necessary measures, which bill has passed the House of Representatives and is now before the Senate of the United States; and

"Whereas certain commission firms and cattle dealers of the Union Stock-Yards of Chicago have seen fit to oppose such legislation and to send a committee with legal counsel to Washington to lobby for the defeat of this bill; and

"Whereas members of said firms have repeatedly stated in public interviews in the Chicago press that they opposed said bill because its covert object was to quarantine the State of Texas under the plea of existing contagious diseases and thus prevent the bringing of Texas cattle into the Chicago market in summer: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we hereby desire to express in most emphatic language that this association of cattle-growers, representing $200,000,000 invested in breeding cattle, approves, indorses, and supports in their fullest sense the measures of said bill; that they regard these measures absolutely and vitally important to the permanent security of their business; that as producers and contributors to the taxable wealth of the country in one of the largest industries in the United States they demand from Congress such measures of protection as it has heretofore granted to the other great producing industries.

"Resolved, That we regard the interest of the commission firms of the Union Stock-Yards of Chicago as those of brokers only, limited to the commission which they receive for selling the stock; that the vast interest represented as centering in those yards is not the property of these men, but the property of those who produced it; that the firms referred to would not suffer by its entire destruction, except in consequent loss of business to themselves.

"Resolved, That in answer to a suggestion of injury to the Texas interests that members of this association are the largest customers for Texas cattle in the West, and hope and expect to remain so; that 150,000 head of Texas cattle have been bought by the members of this association for delivery the coming summer, and that it knows of no cattle disease in any part of Texas which could justify the application of quarantine measures in that State; and, lastly,

"Be it resolved, In view of the above facts, that this association regards the action of the commission firms above mentioned as originating in a selfish and narrow view of their own interests as highly injurious to the vast cattle-producing industry of the plains, and deserving of our unqualified censure; further, that in earnestly approving of and desiring the immediate passage of said animal-industry bill it is our duty to appoint a committee to voice this opinion in Washington and to use every honest means to secure this end."

* * * * * * * *

Mr. Babbitt offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

"Whereas this association finds that it has been seriously injured by the pooling arrangement prevailing among the buyers on the Chicago stock-yard; and

"Whereas the prices of hay, together with yardage, constitute a heavy tax upon the value of our cattle: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That it is incumbent upon this association to examine any and all measures which may result in the opening of another market for our cattle, whereby a higher return may be obtained; that the plan proposed by Mr. Frewn and explained by our secretary in his report offers a possible method of getting our own beeves, and also lighter cattle if desired, to the very highest market, namely, that of Great Britain; that the executive committee is hereby instructed to obtain the fullest possible information on the above points and report their conclusions to the association, either by circular or at a special meeting."

Springer, April 7, 1884.

Mr. Head then introduced a resolution regarding the cattle-industry bill now before Congress, and urging the necessity of the passage of the bill. The resolution passed unanimously, and the secretary was instructed to send a copy of it to Senator Plumb and Delegate Manzanares.

Mr. PLUMB. I am also informed by one of the Senators from New Hampshire that the legislature of that State has passed a resolution recommending substantially such legislation as is now pending before this body. Is there any necessity for this legislation? The Senator from Texas yesterday said there was no pleuro-pneumonia anywhere except in a very limited area in this country. Grant that there is none except there, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] well said yesterday, for the first time in the history of this interest in this country there is a movement of cattle from the East to the West. The dairy interests of the West have become large, and we are seeking to improve our herds by getting high-bred animals from the East. They are going out into Illinois, into Michigan, into Wisconsin, into Kansas, into Iowa, and away out on the plains. That has become a very important industry in the Western States. They go out at all ages, from calves up to two and four years of age, and cows and bulls. It is a trade which is constantly increasing, and it is of great interest to that section of country to improve the breeds of these animals; and yet at every touch they are apprehensive that the animals they get from the East may be impregnated with some disease which, once started upon those great ranges, can never be thoroughly stamped out. Admitting that the disease is just as insignificant as the Senator from Texas says, is not the mere suggestion, the mere hint even, that a damage of that kind might result to this great food interest of our country enough to warrant Congress in adopting measures of a preventive character?

The Senator from New Jersey must be mindful of the fact that his own State has legislated upon this question. Is there any pleuro-pneumonia in this country? The Senator from New Jersey says there is none, but the Legislature of his State has appropriated money to pay for stamping it out, and to pay for the animals that have been destroyed in the belief that they possessed it. Will he set up his word against that of the veterinary surgeons of his State, men possessing high reputation?

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is there any evidence in the Senator's possession now that it has not been stamped out in the State of New Jersey?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know that there is any evidence that it has not been, and yet no man can tell that it ever has been stamped out thoroughly. It is an insidious disease. After the best has been done that can be done, there may still be some animals left that have not been reached. Besides, that State borders upon the great State of Pennsylvania. There may be a herd adjoining the line between those States that may be affected, and the operation of the laws of New Jersey could not reach that herd, and thus the disease would be communicated on the other side of the line. I understand from the report of the Treasury Cattle Commission that it is the fact that this disease has been carried across the line into the State of Pennsylvania. At all events, it has been found on both sides of the line in such a way as to lead to the belief that it has been carried across, and it has evoked the operations of those two States, the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, to stamp it out.

The operations of the States will necessarily be limited and measurably ineffective. The decision which the Senator from Alabama quoted to-day, the Railroad Company vs. Husen, was a decision which involved the constitutionality of a law of the State of Missouri, which had attempted to prevent the introduction of Texas cattle into that State. The Supreme Court of the United States held that that law was unconstitutional because it was a regulation of interstate commerce. The traffic in cattle and all things which concern it become questions of the regulation of interstate commerce, and that is within the competency of Congress alone. It is not within the power of the State of New Jersey to prevent the introduction of cattle within the limits of that State, because under this decision the court say that transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself, every obstacle to or burden laid upon which by legislative authority is regulation, and that regulation can only be adopted, carried on, and made effective by Congressional action.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I infer from the argument the Senator is now making that he derives the power to pass this bill from the power to regulate commerce. Does he think that the power to regulate commerce in the General Government can touch subjects of commerce before they are in a condition to be transported, cattle in the field or goods in the warehouse, which are a part of the general property of the State?

Mr. PLUMB. I think they can if they are of a kind that are subject to be and which in the very nature of things must be transported before they can be sold. You can not say of one animal that it is a subject of Federal jurisdiction and of another that it is not. It can not be the question of the intent of the owner that shall determine the constitutionality of the power of the General Government to put its hand on that animal and say it shall be dealt with in a certain way. It is the fact that it is itself a subject of interstate commerce, and that one of the most obvious purposes in connection with it is that it shall be transported to some distance or to a market outside of the State for use.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. All cattle are not necessarily raised for transportation.

Mr. PLUMB. No; and the argument of the Senator from Florida would rest simply in saying that as all cattle are not necessarily for transportation therefore the Federal power can not touch any unless they shall in fact be transported.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does the Senator from Kansas believe that the power to regulate commerce as provided for in the Federal Constitution carries with it the power to prohibit commerce?

Mr. PLUMB. A regulation may be prohibition. Regulation would necessarily be prohibition for a particular period of time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not know whether the word "regulate" as used in the Federal Constitution carries with it any such extraordinary or enlarged power as the Senator from Kansas indicates. I have never yet believed that the power to regulate is the power to absolutely prohibit. When the Senator undertakes to say that under any condition of things that to-day exists or that has been found to exist in the experience of the past there is any power in this Government to say that cattle from the great State of Texas should not leave the State for six long months, I think he is carrying the interpretation of the power to regulate to a point which has never been done before.

Mr. PLUMB. There is nothing of that kind in this bill. The Senator from New Jersey has been afflicted with what was the matter with the Senator from Texas yesterday.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will yield one moment further: he now makes a denial that he brought it in as argument at all that any such thing is found in this bill. The Senator quoted that and made use of it. He quoted the report of the Cattle Commission, who recommended that the cattle in the State of Texas, because it was possible to communicate disease from those cattle, should be prohibited from leaving that State for six months. If I did not understand the Senator to say that he fully approved of that report, then I will confess the fault is with me and not with him. I certainly so understood him, and to concede that under that clause of the Federal Constitution, to wit, the power to regulate, it was perfectly competent for Congress to pass such legislation as would absolutely prohibit.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it is. I think it is perfectly competent for Congress to do it; but there is nothing of that kind in the bill; and the Senator did not understand me, or at least I did not say (whatever the Senator may have understood), that I indorsed the recommendation of the Treasury Cattle Commission. I only referred to it incidentally in connection with the argument of the Senator from Texas yesterday. I am only alluding to the bill now. What is in the bill I indorse. I would go much further if it were in my power, but that is not necessarily a subject of discussion here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Kansas allows me to respond for one moment to the interrogatory of the Senator from New Jersey in relation to the power of Congress over commerce to regulate it. The power to regulate commerce necessarily extends to the extent of prohibition, else where do you get your power of quarantine, where does Congress get the power to lay an embargo upon foreign trade? The clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States is as absolute in respect to interstate commerce as it is to foreign commerce. To regulate means that Congress shall have power to adopt all needful rules and regulations necessary to conduct commerce in such a manner that it shall not injure the health, the lives, or the property of the people, whether those dangers come from abroad or whether they come from State to State. It is to see that commerce is conducted so that it shall not damage the people in their health, their lives, or their property. We do not go to the general-welfare clause or the common-defense clause of the Constitution for power over this question. That power is as absolutely clear as any other grant of power which is enumerated in the Constitution.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not care to get into a discussion of the constitutional question. That has been thoroughly discussed elsewhere. It ought to be sufficient to say that when the States themselves have attempted to do that which would prevent the introduction of diseased cattle into their limits from outside, the Supreme Court has said that that was beyond their power. To deny the power to the General Government is to deny the power anywhere. In the case which I have before me that was the precise issue involved. The State of Missouri had attempted by a statute to quarantine against Texas cattle, which it is known convey disease. Even the Senator from Texas, their special advocate on this floor, admits that such is the case.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. Does not the Supreme Court in its decision in the Missouri case recognize the right of any State to quarantine against diseased cattle?

Mr. PLUMB. I presume that it would recognize the right to quarantine against diseased cattle, provided that question could be determined by due process of law before any steps were taken. In other words, while that was being determined by the slow process of the law the disease by its swifter processes would have affected the herds of the entire State. But it is enough to say that all the ingenuity of all the Western States that have attempted and have tried to quarantine against Texas cattle has been insufficient to pass any law which would stand the test of scrutiny in the Supreme Court. They have all been declared to be unconstitutional.

We have heard a great deal about the question of advertising disease. Even the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] could not make his constitutional argument without saying that on the whole we were constantly doing injury to the interests of this country by advertising the existence of disease. That which is known of this country is known irrespective of what Congress says or does, and the smallest part of that which is published and what makes up the great sum of the intelligence of the people of this country is what transpires on this floor. We have not advertised this thing, and no law that we may pass will advertise it. It has been advertised as far and wide as newspapers go, as wide as human intelligence extends. The old countries, Great Britain notably, take care of the health of their people and of their interests, and they are constantly on the lookout for matters of this kind, and they do not apply to us, but they embargo their own cattle and thereby advertise to us, on the theory which is so often repeated, that they have diseased cattle among their own herds.

The newspapers have given this to the winds; the stockmen themselves have done it by their own appliances in reference to the spread and prevention of this disease, and we can not shut it out, we can not stop it. If Congress to-morrow or to-day were to pass a joint resolution unanimously, saying that there is no disease in this country, it would have no more effect abroad or anywhere else on public opinion than the Pope's bull against the comet. It is not in our power to put our heads in the sand and prevent mankind from seeing the remainder of our bodies exposed. People do not judge of the truth or the falsity of facts in matters of this kind by means of joint resolutions or laws of Congress. We have got to recognize the fact in the first place that wherever cattle are they are liable to disease, and we have for our own safety as well as that of people abroad to adopt measures which will prevent the spread of disease, and which will guarantee the health and healthfulness of the food products which we sell abroad.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey should not have spoken about this question of advertising, because his own State, by a law passed as late as 1880, adopted means to stamp out the pleuro-pneumonia in New Jersey. Why was not his potential voice heard in that State at that time, saying to them, "Hush, you will give this thing away; you will hurt the State of New Jersey and its stock interests; just stop and do not legislate on this question; nobody will ever find it out." The State of New Jersey, not admonished by a warning of that kind, enacted a law providing for stamping out pleuro-pneumonia, and other States have done the same thing, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, New York, New Hampshire, Minnesota, Nebraska, Michigan, and so on. The State of Michigan even has sinned so much against common sense as to provide as follows in section 3 of its cattle act:

SEC. 3. No cattle brought from Texas or the Indian Territory shall be permitted to pass through this State, or any part of the same, from the 1st day of March to the 1st day of November, in each year.

I have no doubt if they could hear the powerful voice of my friend from Texas they would be informed that Texas cattle do not communicate disease to other cattle; but the State of Michigan needs a great deal of enlightenment on that point.

But, Mr. President, we buy a great many cattle from Great Britain. We are interested all the while in getting better breeds of cattle from the other side of the water, and Great Britain is interested in selling them to us; and yet they have put upon their statute-book their law of 1878 providing for the most careful and thorough inspection upon the assumption that pleuro-pneumonia and the foot-and-mouth disease and other diseases exist among the cattle and the sheep and the hogs of that great realm. Talk about the power that is conferred upon the Commissioner of Agriculture by this bill! Let me read now from the orders of the privy council, based on the law of 1878, showing to what extent they go in England.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly it is not claimed that under our form of government the American Congress has the powers of the British Parliament.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not discussing the constitutional question at all. I am discussing simply the question of advertising this thing and of the necessity of whatever power is conferred in this bill to do the act which shall accomplish the purpose in view. Here it is said:

It shall not be lawful for any person to send or carry, or cause to be sent or carried, on a railway, canal, river, or inland navigation, or in a coasting vessel, or on a highway, or thoroughfare, any dung, fodder, or litter that has been in a pleuro-pneumonia, or a foot-and-mouth disease, or a sheep-pox, or a swine-fever infected place, or that has been in any place in contact with or used about a diseased animal, horse, ass, or mule, except with a license of the local authority for the district in which such place is situate, on a certificate of an inspector certifying that the thing moved has been, as far as practicable, disinfected.

And so all the way through this great volume which I hold in my hand are contained the most minute regulations. Cattle can not come from an infected district, can not be sold at public auction anywhere, or exhibited for sale in a market-place without a special permit naming the animal to be sold, &c. The people of Great Britain are not afraid of advertising the existence of disease there; they admit its existence just as it is with us. They simply say "we are showing our good will in regard to this matter; we exhibit to the people of the world the fact that we have adopted wise precautions against the spread of disease." They subject all cattle to inspection in such a way that if the Senator from New Jersey, or any one else, goes there to buy a high-bred animal to be imported into this country, he may be certain that he buys an animal that is healthful. That is what we have got to do.

But the Senator from New Jersey says let us not submit ourselves to a law of inspection. I am not so much concerned about the British people as I am about the American people. I want a law to prevent the spread of disease here, and can we suppose that, if disease exists here and is going unchecked from State to State and spreading itself all over this country, any measure of inspection we can adopt will convey to the people on the other side the assurance that the cattle that we send them are free from it?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator bear with me one moment?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The mistake that the Senator makes in his argument is that his premises are not true. I deny in toto his premises. His argument would be exceedingly good if his premises were true. He speaks of the spread of disease all over this country, the facts being that there is no such thing in the country, and no spread of it therefore. His superstructure is built upon a very slim foundation, in fact on no foundation at all.

Mr. PLUMB. Why, Mr. President, against the testimony of the Senator from New Jersey which of course if he was testifying of a thing he knew about would be as good as that of anybody else, against his fiat, his dictum, here is the testimony of the veterinary surgeons of his own State, of the Legislature of his own State who passed a bill for the destruction of the cattle disease, the report of the Cattle Commission of the Treasury Department, and the report of the veterinary commission of his own State. Does he mean to say, in view of these, that there is no disease in this country?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator will bear with me again. I submit it is not exactly fair to bring in as an argument on this bill what took place in New Jersey, what existed in New Jersey years ago. I submit also that it is not exactly fair as part of his argument to bring in what New Jersey has done toward stamping out this disease within its own borders. It is certainly no particular disgrace to the people of New Jersey if they found disease even in animals existing in that State, that they took hold of the case and dealt with it and stamped it out. That was the end of it. I only ask that other States may do the same thing without coming to the Congress of the United States and having discussions of this character, giving notice to foreign nations that we discredit the great products about which the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] spoke so eloquently yesterday. Why should we discredit our own animals in foreign nations? New Jersey, finding the disease existing to a limited extent in its own borders, immediately took hold of it by its own Legislature and put an end to it. This can be done by other States without any of the trammels that are intended to be placed on business by the bill of the honorable Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, we are not dealing with a hypothetical case. We are dealing with a case which has existed as a matter of fact, with an embargo which to-day rests upon this product, and with the necessity of doing something which shall remove that embargo.

In the first place, while I do not doubt the good intentions of the State of New Jersey, I can not suppose that the actions of that State are not as well known abroad as the actions of Congress are known abroad, and consequently the legislation of that State, the publications made in the newspapers about the effort to stamp out the disease, about its existence, and all the other things connected with it, have been as well known abroad as though they had been the subject of discussion in the Senate or in the House of Representatives of Congress.

In the next place, State action is ineffectual. Suppose the disease does exist in the State of New Jersey, that State is not going to quarantine against cattle going out. It will leave that for other countries to do, and it will permit animals to be sent out of that State that have the disease if any one is willing to buy them. I am speaking of this because it is a common thing. Everybody would do the same. We permit an animal to go out to any quarter of the globe if anybody wants to buy it. Self-interest would prevent a diseased animal from coming in. It wants a quarantine against the introduction of diseased cattle into the State. All the State will quarantine against will be, so far as it can, against the introduction of cattle from outside within its own limits, and that, as I have said, it can not effectually do because of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Therefore Kansas is not protected against New Jersey by the operation of the New Jersey law, and when Kansas comes to protect itself against New Jersey the Supreme Court comes in and says she can not do it. We have been protected by the fact that heretofore cattle have gone from the West to the East, and not from the East to the West, and therefore the disease has not had opportunity to make its way West.

Now, Mr. President, I shall refer somewhat to the argument of the Senator from Texas upon this question of the Texas fever, and I desire to say in the beginning that I sympathize entirely with him in his expressions of interest in regard to that great industry of his State. He worthily represents it, he is justly solicitous about it, and I do not desire that that industry in his State shall be put under any ban that may not be necessary; and yet he admits himself that the cattle from Texas carry the disease where they go among domestic animals. He did not need to make that admission. There is not a cattle-grower in the State of Kansas, or the State of Missouri, or the State of Illinois, or in fact I might say in any State west of the Alleghany Mountains, that does not recognize it, and there are very few of them that have not had occasion to feel it in their purses. Some years they do not seem to communicate it. It is an enigma, and it is sometimes regarded as a myth; but again on the trail of where the Texas cattle go it is as though that vast country had been burned by fire. Every animal sometimes within miles of where these cattle have gone will die, and the better the cattle the more certain they are to die.

But the Senator from Texas stated yesterday that the people there regulate it themselves, and how? He said they regulate it by the shotgun. So they do sometimes. It is because of the feeling of insecurity that comes from the lack of any effective quarantine that the people take the law into their own hands, and sometimes it does happen that men who bring cattle into Missouri and into Kansas from Texas during the summer season are met by shotguns. Men are defiant of interstate commerce or of any other thing which threatens them with the destruction of all the interests they have gathered up at such great labor and such great sacrifice and which may at any time disappear.

This has been the subject of legislation in Missouri; it has sometimes divided parties; it has been the most important question sometimes which has been the subject of enactment by the Legislatures of Kansas and Missouri; and with all that has been done the prohibition has not been wholly effective.

It is true that out of this discussion, out of the necessity of the situation, has come an adjustment, and so long as it can be observed the trade may be carried on with safety. Men drive cattle from Texas to the Indian Territory and hold them there during the summer months. It is well understood and recognized that after frost comes there is no danger from the disease, and therefore cattle which are held in the Indian Territory until after frost can be driven with safety into Kansas, and men buy them, and the commerce between those two States in cattle has become a great one, and nobody desires to interrupt it, nobody desires to prevent it; but everybody who has material interests there does desire that it shall be so regulated, so managed, and so under control that it can be carried on without danger of the irruptions that occasionally happen whereby great losses occur to domestic cattle in the States of Kansas and Missouri. The losses in the State of Kansas, I have no doubt, from the death of domestic cattle by the Texas fever would aggregate as much as all the profits that have been made out of that trade by the people of that State. Of course they are not so equally distributed.

Some men make during the course of years great profits. Other men who do not engage in it, but who have been subjected to contact with the cattle driven from Texas to Kansas, have lost an entire herd. As I said before, the better the cattle the more certain they are to die. Men say because, as the Senator from Texas says, they can jump a ten-rail fence, because they can outrun a quarter-horse, and all that sort of thing, therefore they cannot be diseased. Mr. President, the answer to that is the answer which the man in jail gave to the lawyer who said: "You can not be put in jail, my dear friend, for this offense." "My dear sir," he said, "here I am." The cattle die wherever Texas cattle are driven, all along their track, and whatever it may be, splenetic or whatever kind of disease, it is truly a disease to the cattle that are affected by it, and who die on account of it.

The Senator from Texas read yesterday some dispatches from Chicago stating that it had never occurred in Chicago. I have here the testimony taken by the Treasury Cattle Commission in regard to Texas fever, which has resulted from the introduction of cattle through the Chicago yards into other portions of the country:

Joseph Breck, Brecksville Road, lives five miles from Cleveland. He has fifty-five cows, and sells their milk in the city. Occasional cases of parturient apoplexy are the only affections from which his cows die. Upon examination I found his cows healthy. He buys fresh cows from the farmers in the country around, and sometimes goes into Indiana and buys a car-load at a time. His cows run at pasture except during the time they are milked, at which time they are fed grain, and sometimes hay or cornstalks. Farmers two or three miles from him have lost cows of Texas fever, but with that exception there is no disease among the suburban dairies.

W. A. Ramsay, superintendent of the Saint Louis stock-yards, says—

That the only disease among cattle here was Texas fever, and that this year there had been less than ever of that disease. The cause of its becoming less and less each year, he thought, was due to the fact that the cattle in Texas were becoming more domesticated.

That is to say, they can not jump quite so high fences—

Large numbers of well-bred bulls were taken into the State every year and had greatly improved the grade of cattle. A greater amount of land is being cultivated, which changes the character of the herbage and may have some influence in preventing the disease. The number of deaths was greatest in 1876 from Texas fever. He stated that there was but very little trade in eastern dairy calves; the majority of that stock goes to Chicago market and is distributed from there.

Mr. W. S. Hensley, another cattle-dealer, said—

He had never seen a case of lung-plague in the yards or anywhere else; does not know what the disease is. Had not seen three steers sick with Texas fever this season. Other years numbers of cattle had died from it, but it was becoming less and less prevalent each year, due, he thought, to the better breeding of cattle in Texas.

And at Detroit—

The Texas cattle disease has been transmitted to Michigan cattle by their occupying pens which had been previously occupied by Texas cattle. An instance occurred some years ago in which eight Michigan steers were driven from the yards to Dearborn, a village ten miles from Detroit; they all died shortly afterward of the Texas cattle fever. Texas cattle are still brought to the yards, but they are not put into the same yards as other cattle, and in consequence of greater care being exercised no deaths have occurred during the last two years. This is the only contagious disease which has been contracted in or spread from the cattle-yards on Twentieth street.

Mr. BAYARD. What was the date of that?

Mr. PLUMB. September, 1881. There is abundant testimony of the same kind from other quarters, which I will not detain the Senate by reading. I do not mean to say that there ought to be an absolute embargo all the year on Texas cattle; I do not mean to say either that there ought to be anything more than a qualified embargo for any portion of the year. All I do say is that Texas cattle do communicate disease; that there is no unreason, but there is great reason, therefore, that their transportation from place to place without the borders of that State should be the subject of regulation, and that that regulation should be designed to prevent any communicable fever reaching the herds of those who have built up stock interests of their own and who have rejoiced in the bettering of the grade of their cattle from year to year, thus adding to their own wealth and to the wealth of the country. They should not be exposed to this great and dangerous infection.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator pardon me? I have listened to the various statements he has read from this report and I do not remember to have heard in any case the fact that the disease was communicated by cattle from Texas. They use the words "Texas fever," but I do not find in any of the statements where the disease is traced to cattle driven from Texas. They speak several times of cows distant two or three miles taking the fever, but that might be engendered elsewhere than from cattle which are transported from a great distance. It certainly is a paradox in all medical history, as certainly in all ordinary reason, that either a man or an animal can communicate that which he or it does not possess, and in this case the statement is that these cattle are perfectly healthy; indeed, as I heard the Senator read just now, that the more healthy they are the more liable they are to communicate the disease to others. I can not help thinking that there is a great deal that is loose, that is exaggerated, that is not connected with any sufficient data in the way of facts.

Mr. PLUMB. If I had supposed that this would be questioned at all I should have exhibited to the Senator authority on the subject that he would not have doubted.

Mr. BAYARD. I mean to say the authorities I have read are in favor of the idea I suggest.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator is mistaken. While people speak of the Texas fever and sometimes omit to state that it is communicated by Texas cattle, at the same time the fact that it is communicated by Texas cattle is the one thing, and the only thing, that stands as Texas fever. Consequently if it is not communicated by Texas cattle it is not Texas fever—that is to say, within this range I have spoken of—because this exists at places where Texas cattle alone of all Southern cattle are sold.

But if the Senator from Delaware had been listening closely he would have observed that the gentleman who spoke of the disease at Detroit says distinctly:

An instance occurred some years ago in which eight Michigan steers were driven from the yards to Dearborn, a village ten miles from Detroit; they all died shortly afterward of the Texas cattle fever.

They were destroyed by their occupying pens which had been previously occupied by Texas cattle. There is no question about this matter, and the Senator from Texas himself admits this to be the case. I do not say that they are in a condition of absolute health; that I do not know; but certainly they are healthy so far as concerns anything which affects their activity or the value of their carcasses for beef or any of the other ordinary uses to which cattle are put. But they do themselves communicate to other cattle a disease the most deadly of all diseases ever known so far as I have had any experience among cattle. Before this debate closes I shall be glad to have the testimony of the Senator from Missouri on that point, as I have no doubt he has tried, as almost every lawyer in his State has, cases in which this very question has arisen.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for one moment?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. I hold in my hand a copy of the New York World of to-day, which gives telegraphic information from the other side that the British Parliament are now engaged in a discussion of the cattle bill. The appropriate department of that government is forced to execute its law as regards the infected districts. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if any argument other than the one he is now making would be needed in the British Parliament to convince that body of men that American cattle should be ejected or debarred from entering the British ports anywhere? In justice to the intelligence of that body of men I should say without hesitation that that was all the argument needed, all the proof needed to convince them that it was decidedly dangerous to allow a live animal from the United States of America to even have a foothold upon British soil.

Now, one word more. Let me ask the honorable Senator from Kansas, if that result were reached, if the bill to-day passed by the British Government should become a law, the natural result would be an absolute depreciation in the value of all the animals of this country; not those intended for export, not our surplus, because it is the surplus that always determines the value of the entire product. The value of every pound of cotton raised in this country is determined by the value of the amount exported to Liverpool and London. There would be a depreciation of more than 3 cents a pound upon the entire meat product raised in this country by reason of that embargo by the British Government. Subtract, if you please, that loss in the next year from all possible contingencies or damage that may arise by reason of disease which to-day does not exist in this country except in the imagination of some people—subtract that loss in one year, if you please, from the whole measure of damage that can possibly result, and it is very small in the ratio of this vast interest involved. The statement of the Senator from Kansas alone, without any effort on the part of any other Senator, speaking as he does as the representative upon the floor of the committee having charge of this measure—that statement alone, read upon the floor of the British Parliament, would do more damage to the cattle industry of this country than all the disease that is likely to happen in the next forty years.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it happened that about six years before I opened my head on this question the British Parliament passed an act substantially prohibiting the introduction of American cattle into the British ports—that is to say, prohibiting their being taken beyond the point of landing.

Mr. McPHERSON. The honorable Senator from Kansas is too intelligent for me to undertake to explain to him that provision and the reasons for it. The English Government, like the American Government, desires to protect the industries of its own people. The cattle industry in England has been a very large one. They were able for a long period of time to supply the people of that country with all the meat they needed. The time came when they were unable to supply them except at a very large price. The British Government to-day unquestionably are engaged in some scheme that will bring to their aid at this particular time that vast industry, representing the agricultural interest of England; they desire some measure of protection which will bind them to the existing government and give it the influence and support of that large class of people. For one, interested as I am, in sympathy as I am, feeling as I do in support of the interests of my own country, I am very much perplexed and very much pained to find that where there is no cause but this widespread assertion Senators will rise in their place in the Senate and will assist any such scheme as will turn the surplus of this country, that we desire so much to get rid of, back upon our own people and find no market for it anywhere.

Mr. PLUMB. As I said, years before I ever opened my head on this subject the British Government had adopted the rule of which we are now complaining. They did it for reasons which were satisfactory to them. One of two things is true: either they sincerely believe it or they do not. If they believe it, it is in our power to remove the doubt and the distrust with which our cattle are regarded by a thorough inspection at home preparatory to their going abroad and the necessary measures to prevent the spread of the disease and also extirpate it where it can be done. If they were insincere, and if, as the Senator from New Jersey now says, it was done, not because our cattle had disease, but because they desired to put up a barrier in behalf and for the benefit of the cattle producers of the British Islands, then I ask him how all this debate does any hurt?

But beyond all that he says long before anything was said here the cattle interest of this country took alarm, and they themselves, the very men whose property has been depreciated by this rumor in regard to the disease, the very men whose property is depreciated for the reason that there is no definite way of determining the existence of disease and giving that to the world, have been besieging the halls of Congress, through the public press, in public meetings held for the purpose, and asking this legislation; and as the Senator from New Jersey, himself interested in only one aspect of this case, only in the abattoir part of it, only in the commission handling of cattle, sets himself up as an authority on this question——

Mr. McPHERSON. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Senator from New Jersey is interested in any aspect of the case?

Mr. PLUMB. I understood the Senator to say so to the Senator from Texas yesterday.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Texas yesterday asked me if I had had any knowledge or experience on the subject, and I answered him. Let me read from the RECORD exactly what I said. I think I used the word "somewhat."

Mr. COKE. That was the answer.

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to say to the Senator from Kansas, and in saying it to him to say to all Senators, that the Senator from New Jersey is not interested directly or indirectly in any aspect of the case except as a cattle-grower. There is no aspect of the case in any shape or form other than that, and that to a very limited extent. My occupation is as a farmer, and in no other aspect of the case am I interested in the least. If I were interested to any extent, great or little, in the matter, it would not change my mind as to what would be a proper measure of legislation in the premises.

Mr. PLUMB. I beg the Senator's pardon for anything I may have said that seemed to impute to him anything that was wrong. I did not mean to do that. I did not assume in the slightest degree that his interest, whatever it might be, was not entirely proper. I understood him to say something more than I find in the RECORD. I have not examined the RECORD this morning. I am very glad to be corrected by him, and to say further that what I remarked was not with the design of imputing anything to him, but simply to appeal to him not to allow the interest which he seemed to have in the free course of trade to prevail against the interest which the people who are at the back of this trade themselves believe is to be subserved by the passage of this bill, and upon that I stand. Here are the cattle-men themselves, whose every interest is touched by this legislation, who have been touched heretofore in their pockets by the adverse legislation of Great Britain, who believe that this is the best way to demonstrate to Great Britain and to the world that our cattle are not diseased; or if they are diseased, that if we have the power to stamp it out we will adopt measures to that end in order that the cattle we send abroad may go abroad absolutely free from any suspicion of being otherwise than entirely healthy. They know what they want better than I know, better than any Senator on this floor knows, and it is because they do know that I am here urging that this measure, so important to them, and so important to the great interests of this country, shall be passed, that they shall have this little pittance at the hands of Congress to enable their products to take their old place in the markets of the world free from any suspicion that they are not what they assume to be, fit articles of human food.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Kansas for a few minutes. I asked the honorable Senator while he was speaking to name a legislative body, or a body of stock-raisers or of farmers, or a public assembly anywhere in the United States that had ever asked legislative action for protection against the so-called "Texas fever." The honorable Senator did not reply directly at first, but after a while did say that the Legislature of the State of New York had requested such legislation. I replied to the Senator that I had never heard of such action of the Legislature of New York. The Senator remarked in reply that there might be other things I should hear of yet on this subject that I had not heard of.

Now, I call the Senator's attention to the action of the Legislature of the State of New York. I have it here. It is recited in the report of Mr. Hatch, accompanying the House bill, the same now before us. Here is the resolution:

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Senators of this State in Congress be instructed, and the Representatives of this State be requested, to use their best efforts to secure the enactment of a law to carry into effect the recommendations made by the Treasury Cattle Commission in its report transmitted to Congress in February, 1882, for the extinction of the lung-plague and to provide means therefor, or to secure such other legislation as may speedily and effectually accomplish the result.

The honorable Senator in reply to me said that this resolution asks for the enactment of a law in accordance with the recommendations of the Treasury Cattle Commission. That commission asked and recommended the enactment of a law that would quarantine not only Texas cattle but all cattle in the infected belt at least seven months in the year, and in addition legislation on the "lung-plague." I thought, and so did everybody else, from the honorable Senator's reply, that the resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York covered the entire recommendations of the Cattle Commission, but upon reading the resolution I find that it is confined to a request to Congress to carry out the recommendations of the Cattle Commission as to lung-plague or pleuro-pneumonia, and as to nothing else. The Texas fever, which is classed as a plague with pleuro-pneumonia in the report of that commission, is not mentioned or alluded to in the resolution of the Legislature, and no other inference can be drawn from that fact than that it was purposely omitted.

The Senator from Kansas said that a national convention of live-stock breeders of the United States, representing twenty-two of the principal stock-growing States and Territories, held in the city of Chicago, November 16, 1883, presented to the House a resolution asking that the Texas fever and all other infectious and contagious diseases be dealt with.

Mr. PLUMB. I simply said that they recommended the passage of this bill; that is all.

Mr. COKE. I have the memorial of that convention in my hand. I find it printed in the RECORD of January 16, 1884. Here is the way it reads:

In view of losses already sustained and of the yet greater dangers menacing us, we most earnestly recommend that your honorable bodies enact such laws as will not only relieve us from the unjust suspicion which attaches to our live-stock and meat products abroad, but that you will also take proper measures to provide for the extinction of the disease of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, which can only be done by the slaughter of all infected cattle and the thorough disinfection of infected premises.

The Senator was again mistaken; the passage of this bill was not asked for by that convention, but only a law providing for the extinction of pleuro-pneumonia was asked for. This bill would embargo Texas cattle, and this resolution asks for no such thing.

That is the great convention which assembled at Chicago, referred to so triumphantly by the Senator from Kansas. I have here the resolutions of the Kansas State board of agriculture:

Resolved, That our members in Congress be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to favor such legislation as may be necessary to determine and clearly define the territory in the United States now infected with the disease among cattle known as pleuro-pneumonia, and to circumscribe and stamp out this much-dreaded disease in this country by the purchase, if necessary, at the expense of the Government, and slaughter of all animals infected with the disease or known to have been exposed thereto.

Pleuro-pneumonia! Not one single allusion to the Texas fever in any of these memorials, in any of these resolutions. I stated that such was the case to the Senator from Kansas when he was on his feet. He denied it, and I propose to show that I was right:

Also the following joint memorial from the Legislature of Montana concerning pleuro-pneumonia in cattle.

Then follows the memorial:

We, your memoralists, therefore respectfully request the passage of some measure by your honorable body which will tend to effectually eradicate this fearful disease; and if no better or surer method is offered, we would beg leave to suggest the purchase by the Government of all cattle affected by the disease and their immediate destruction.

Again:

Also the following resolutions from the Stock-Breeder's Association of Minnesota, held at the Board of Trade rooms, Minneapolis, December 19, 1883, indorsing the action of the national convention of live-stock breeders of the United States held at Chicago—

From whose memorial I have just read—and to which reference has been made:

"Resolved, That we heartily indorse the foregoing resolutions, and that we ask our Senators and Representatives at Washington to use all honorable means, when the matter is brought up for consideration, to secure such legislation for the protection of our cattle and meat products as the Secretary of the Treasury and the above committee deem expedient."

Every single memorial and resolution referred to in that report, every one referred to by the honorable Senator from Kansas, speaks of pleuro-pneumonia and of that alone. Even the resolutions of the Stock-Breeders' Association of the State of Kansas, the State nearest our great Texas cattle ranches, say nothing about Texas fever, and memorialize Congress for protection against pleuro-pneumonia. What are we to infer from this, Mr. President? What are we to infer from these most significant facts, when the live-stock breeders, and Legislatures, and boards of trade, and other representative bodies meet and pass resolutions and have this subject under consideration, when they absolutely refuse to mention the existence of this Texas fever? What are we to infer from them? Are we to draw the conclusion from their silence on this subject that they desire to class Texas fever with pleuro-pneumonia, when they expressly decline to do it?

The Senator from Kansas says they did mean to include Texas fever, but he gives no reason why they did not say so in their memorials. The fact that the Congress of the United States never yet has been asked by anybody except by the veterinary surgeon of the Agricultural Department and by the Treasury Cattle Commission for legislation upon the subject of the Texas fever is one that can not be denied. The Treasury Cattle Commission have discovered that the Texas fever is a great plague, and although that report was made in 1883 and many of these memorials have been adopted since, not one of the bodies having this great interest in charge has followed suit; and when these bodies were expressly approving the work of this commission and had it under consideration they confined their approval specifically to the measures recommended for the suppression of pluero-pneumonia, saying not a word about its recommendation in regard to Texas fever. If they had used affirmative language of disapproval of the action of these officials touching the so-called "Texas fever," their expression of condemnation could not have been stronger than is implied in their silence on this subject.

Mr. President, I repeat what I said yesterday, that a great interest, not only in my State but extending from Northern Virginia to the Rio Grande, has been libeled and defamed by officers of the Government of the United States. This property has been depreciated; it has been excluded from foreign markets by reason of this assault upon it by these officials; and I do say that the assault was absolutely gratuitous and unnecessary, because the men who raise stock, who deal in stock, who are producers as well as brokers, testify universally that these cattle are not afflicted with any plague and that a little management in handling them is all that is needed.

That these are facts there is no doubt. I say to the Senate that one line of law or enactment applicable to the Texas fever or to Texas stock will be purely gratuitous on the part of Congress, because not one single voice has demanded it except the report that has been made by two or three Government officials, who know less about it than anybody else who has ever bestowed any attention on the subject.

Mr. President, with reference to the pleuro-pneumonia I hold that the great weight and mass and bulk of the testimony before the Senate goes conclusively to show there is no pleuro-pneumonia in this country and that no necessity exists for the passage of this bill. If it be held that pleuro-pneumonia exists at all in this country it must be conceded that it is confined to a few States, in two or three of the Eastern States, in each one of which stringent laws for its suppression exist, and that it is promptly suppressed when it shows itself.

The honorable Senator from Kansas talks about memorials. I admit that he has read quite a number of memorials asking for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia, but I submit respectfully to the Senate that the testimony shows that the memorialists were not informed and were laboring under a misapprehension. Refer to these memorials, and, either in the preamble or in the resolution itself of all of them you find the agricultural reports referred to as showing the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in the country. Every time you find the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture referred to to prove the existence of pleuro-pneumonia; and who, I ask, ought to know best, the Commissioner of Agriculture or the hundreds of men with their millions of dollars invested at Chicago, Jersey City, and East Liberty, and other stock-yards whose certificates have been read here, that in twenty years there has not been in one of these great yards a case of pleuro-pneumonia? I read these certificates to the Senate yesterday, but as some Senators may not have heard them I will read them again:

UNION STOCK-YARDS, Chicago, Ill., April 14, 1884.

To EMORY A. STORRS, Riggs House:

There never has been any sickness among cattle here that any one pretended to call contagious pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease.

E. TITUS WILLIAMS,
Superintendent Union Stock-Yards.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me one moment? I will save him the trouble of all this argument. We do not assert that it has ever been in Chicago or west of the Alleghany Mountains as yet. What we want to do is to keep it from those localities.

Mr. COKE. I will make my own argument if the Senator pleases. Again:

JERSEY CITY, N. J., April 15, 1884.

Hon. EMORY A. STORRS, Washington, D. C.:

Our receipts of cattle at the yard in the year 1883 were 423,800 head. We have never had any pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, or any other contagious disease at these yards.

E. L. LAMBERT,
Assistant Treasurer.
NEWTON & GILLETTE.
DANIEL TOFFEY & CO.
J. F. SADLER & CO.
SPERMAN & CULVER.

Again:

EAST LIBERTY, PA., April 15, 1884.

To E. A. STORRS:

We, the undersigned, certify that we have been in the cattle business at these yards for the last ten years; have never had any stock affected with pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, or any other contagious disease. The receipts at this yard of stock and fat cattle are about 400,000 head per year.

This is signed by the superintendent of the yards and a large number of firms.

Again:

NEW YORK, April 17.

EMORY A. STORRS:

We received and yarded 250,000 cattle last year, and had not a single case of pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease.

J. B. DUTCHER,
President Union Stock-Yard and Market Company.

These reports come from all these great stock-yards in which are congregated cattle from the North, South, East, and West, not casually, not occasionally, but every day, the transactions amounting to millions daily, and yet there never has been a single case of pleuro-pneumonia or contagious disease in any of them, in some for ten years, and in others for twenty years. What conclusion must we draw from this fact? I regard it as absolutely certain that it must have gone into these yards if the disease had an existence in the country. If any gentleman desired information on the subject of the health of cattle, where could he go with greater certainty of obtaining it fully and accurately than to these great receptacles of all the merchantable cattle of this country?

Gentlemen say these men are brokers and interested and not to be relied on. I saw a number of them here—some eight or ten of them—and, if I am any judge of men, they are the peers of any business men I have ever met, having honest, open, intelligent faces, brimful of energy and hard practical sense, just such men as are always successful; that is the character of men—men who stand high, men of good repute, men of influence and force and character. If such men can not be believed, human testimony can not be relied on.

Objection has been made that these gentlemen have seen fit to employ an attorney to represent their interests in this matter in this city. It is not necessary for me to defend Emory Storrs in any tribunal where he is permitted to speak for himself. I feel it but just to say of him here, however, that he is a gentleman distinguished for his ability as a lawyer, standing high socially and in every way as an honorable gentleman, and I do not believe that these citizens of Chicago could have been more ably represented by anybody that I know than they are by him. He has made his arguments and laid them upon the desks of Senators, frankly stating that he is the retained attorney of those he represents, and sought to approach their intelligence by logic and facts. That is all he has done. If you call that lobbying, be it so; I regard it as honorable and legitimate legal service.

The earnestness and activity with which the people who do the great cattle business at the great commercial centers of the country oppose this bill is proof conclusive to my mind that it is radically wrong. Anything which affects the stability of their business is pernicious alike to them and to the breeders of cattle. Any unsettlement of values is hurtful; anything that disturbs the even tenor of healthy and legitimate commerce goes against the interest and the pockets of these gentlemen. I do not care if they are brokers; they handle the cattle of this country and they pay to the producers the annual profits reaped from what they sell.

Mr. President, if the gentlemen who have sent these certificates here are not credible witnesses, if all their interest does not lie on the side of truth, if their interest is not on the side of the producers of this country, I am willing that you may cast aside their testimony. You can not hurt the producers of cattle without wounding these gentlemen. Their highest interest is to be found in the highest prosperity of the producers. The greatest profits they can make are to be found in a healthy commercial intercourse and a stable market for cattle products. Their interest is precisely that of the farmer and cattle-breeder.

All they have in their business depends for its safety on law and order, on the steadiness and stability and uninterrupted flow of the current of the cattle trade. Panic, uneasiness, instability, fluctuation, which it is the professed object of this bill to provide against, but which these eminently practical and intelligent and successful men believe will be promoted and produced by its passage, is always hurtful and often ruinous to them and exactly in the same proportion to the breeders of cattle.

The memorials referred to by the Senator from Kansas are very explicit in demanding legislation for protection against pleuro-pneumonia. The memorialists evidently derived their information as to the existence of this disease from the reports of the Department of Agriculture. The gentlemen whose certificates I have read, with extensive practical knowledge running through many years, testify that there is not and has not been in the great stock-yards of this country a case of pleuro-pneumonia for twenty years. Weigh the testimony and decide which is right. The Senator from Kansas admits that no case of this disease has ever occurred west of the Alleghany Mountains. All of his memorials come from the West except that from the Legislature of New York. The memorialists derive their information from hearsay, while the gentlemen whose certificates I have read handle cattle every day of their lives in the great stock-yards of the country and speak that which they personally know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to misunderstand him and I do not think he wants to be misunderstood. Does he say that there has been no case of pleuro-pneumonia for fifteen years in the United States?

Mr. COKE. I say these gentlemen have testified that there has been no case in the stock-yards, where two and a half millions of cattle annually pass for sale and on the market, coming from everywhere in the United States where cattle are raised, for twenty years; and I say that is a great fact, overcoming all the hearsay of these memorialists.

The Senator from Kansas says that it is only recently that cattle have commenced to go from the East to the West, and in that way he accounts for the non-existence of pleuro-pneumonia in the West. Why, Mr. President, within my knowledge cattle have been imported extensively from the East into Texas for fifteen years past. For twenty years past imported animals have been carried out to the plains in the West and in the Western States, and Texas cattle bought up and put with them for breeding purposes, and the product constitutes to-day the great herds of Montana and Wyoming and Colorado and New Mexico and all the Western States and Territories. The experience of all in the West and Southwest negatives the statement of the Senator from Kansas. So his argument fails to account for the absence of this disease from the West.

Where is pleuro-pneumonia to be found? They can not locate it except to guess at it in some three or four places, and the only gentleman who professes to have any knowledge within hearing of these cases when they were read here was the Senator from New Jersey, and he promptly said that the cases attributed to New Jersey had no existence in fact. The pleuro-pneumonia can not be located except in the Agricultural Report and in the reports of the veterinary surgeons. In these it abounds, and from these sources it goes forth to disturb and unsettle values and plague the great interests involved. It was from these sources that the memorialists of the West, under a feeling of alarm, were inspired, although not one of them had ever seen a case of pleuro-pneumonia.

They believe, as most people do, that everything printed in a book officially is true, and therefore they commence to memorialize Congress to help them. But here are these hard-handed men, and as I have heard them called, hard-headed men, who for twenty years have controlled the great stock-yards where all the cattle of commerce of this country are congregated for sale, men dealing every day with stock which would have developed disease if any had existed in cattle in this country, they come here and say, fresh from the res gestæ of the transaction, "There is no contagious disease here."

Now, will the Senate grant the extraordinary powers given in this bill upon insufficient testimony? If the testimony were overwhelming, if the testimony were predominating in its affirmation of the existence of contagious disease among our cattle, I should have nothing to say, but simply get the best bill I could; but it will be accepted as an undeniable proposition that we should not pass such a bill as this except upon the clearest proof of a necessity for it, and I refer you to the testimony on which I have been commenting to establish as far as it can be done the contrary. It is very difficult and usually impossible to prove a negative. I think that has been as nearly done as it can be in this instance.

Mr. President, I will read an extract from the New York Herald, a cablegram from London bearing on this subject:

LONDON, April 22, 1884.

In the House of Commons to-day Right Hon. George J. Dodson, chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, confirmed the report that fifteen head of cattle had been found at Wimpole, in Cambridgeshire, infected with the foot-and-mouth disease. These were a portion of a herd of fifty-one head recently sent into Cambridgeshire from Liverpool, and the cattle inspector at Liverpool had reported that they were from America. Mr. Dodson asserted, however, that the cattle could not have come from America, the inspector to the contrary notwithstanding, as all American cattle are slaughtered at the ports where they are landed. The last Canadian cattle, moreover, landed at Liverpool, April 12, were perfectly sound. Furthermore, Mr. Dodson said he did not believe there was any foot-and-mouth disease in either the United States or Canada. He moved, therefore, to restore the cattle bill to the original form in which it was introduced in the House of Lords by Baron Carlingford, lord privy seal.

The motion was lost by a half-dozen votes. Chancellor Dodson does not believe there is any foot-and-mouth disease here. Without any fact we are asked to legislate against an imaginary evil, unsustained and unsupported by any testimony except that of the gentlemen who expect to perpetuate themselves in office by the passage of this bill. I hardly think their testimony ought to be admissible against that of citizens engaged in honest and legitimate trade, who have shown their capacity to manage the entire commerce of this country in cattle by the fortunes they have amassed, and whose integrity, although they are cattle brokers, is vouched for by the community in which they live.

I will read here, in conclusion, Mr. President, a letter on the subject of the Texas fever. I read it yesterday, and I will repeat it, because I want it known. Truth will go very slowly, while false representations go in seven-league boots; but I am going to start this truth right after it, giving it a fresh start to-day as I gave it one yesterday, because I believe it is for the public interest for the whole truth to be known about this thing:

Robert Strahorn, H. H. Conover, Lewis R. Hastings, and Reuben P. Conger, being first duly sworn, upon their oath state:

That they are now engaged in buying and selling cattle at the Union Stock-Yards of Chicago, and have been so engaged for at least twenty years past; that the annual receipts of Texas cattle at said stock-yards amount to from 300,000 to 350,000 head, and that the disease known as "Texas fever" is not now regarded at said stock-yards with any apprehension, and has not been so regarded for years, and that any fears that may have been entertained in the past at said stock-yards on that score have been dispelled by reason of almost total immunity from said disease at that point.

That the average number of cattle received and sold at the said stock-yards weekly is about 36,000 head, and that sellers, buyers, and owners of the same—in short, every one handling cattle there—have no hesitation in yarding calves, milch cows, stockers, feeders, fat cattle, or any other cattle in the pens that have just been occupied by Texas cattle, and allowing them to drink water from the same troughs and to eat the hay left by the Texas cattle; and that, in short, the authentic cases of "Texas fever" at said stock-yards have been so small in comparison with the aggregate transactions in Texas cattle that the disease has come to be regarded there as an exploded theory.

R. STRAHORN.
H. H. CONOVER.
L. R. HASTINGS.
R. P. CONGER.

This was sworn to before a notary public, and I have the original affidavit here.

I do not wish to say anything more about this Texas fever. Whoever says it is a plague, or that it is dangerous, or that it is beyond careful handling, is not acquainted with it. There is but one condition under which it is communicated, and that is where Northern unacclimated cattle graze in a field where Texas cattle have been pastured. Then they will take disease at a certain season of the year, but the Northern cow that takes it may be put into another field with one hundred other Northern cows and not one of them will take it from her. It stops with the first transmission, and its transmissibility ceases with the first white frost. That is all there is about it; that is the Texas fever; that is the great plague which has prompted the veterinary surgeons in this city and elsewhere to class Texas fever with lung plague and the foot-and-mouth disease.

Why, Mr. President, one-sixth—I beg Senators to note this fact—one-sixth of the cattle of the United States are now within the limits of Texas. I will not overstate—it is between one-seventh and one-sixth (about half way between)—of the cattle of the United States are in Texas. The Treasury Cattle Commission recommend to this Government to quarantine these cattle from the beginning of March to the beginning of November, the only time that they are fit for market. Take that amount of beef out of our market and you cut the supply short at least a third. It is all the laboring man can now do occasionally to buy a good beefsteak. By quarantining the cattle in the great belt said to be infected with the Texas fever one-third of the beef of the country would be kept out of the market, and up goes the price on the consumers of this country.

It is very true if that were done it might be that some big stock companies, some people who raise beef, some persons who have a great many cattle, would realize a much larger profit on them; but you must remember that it is your consuming laboring people who would have to pay this increased cost. If the recommendation of the Cattle Commission is enforced by enactment of Congress it will be a sorry day for the laboring people of this land.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, obtained the floor.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me? I suppose he does not wish to go on at this hour. It is now 5 o'clock.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I yield.

Mr. McPHERSON. I move an adjournment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator withdraw that motion?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 24, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. CURTIN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the session of Tuesday, May 13, after the morning hour, be devoted to the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think as a matter of safety to the public business an exception should be made, first, of revenue and appropriation bills; then of reports and bills from the Committee on Public Lands. If those three things are expressly excepted I shall not object.

Mr. CURTIN. I will make those exceptions.

Mr. SINGLETON. Except also prior orders.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to prior orders being excepted. I insist those which I have indicated are the only exceptions which should be made.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution as now modified will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the session of Tuesday, May 13, after the morning hour, be devoted to the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation bills, revenue bills, or reports and bills from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] objects unless prior orders are also excepted.

Mr. CURTIN. I will add "or prior orders."

Mr. REED. It seems to me that the bills that are to be presented ought to be specified, that we may know if any of them are objectionable.

Mr. CURTIN. We intend to present the bill in reference to French spoliations and the bill in reference to the indemnity to China.

Mr. COX, of New York. Do the committee propose to present the bill in reference to paying foreign steamships interest on their tonnage tax?

Mr. CURTIN. No, sir.

Mr. REED. The resolution asks for only one day?

Mr. CURTIN. That is all; and we expect to dispose of those two bills on that day.

Mr. REED. I do not object so far as the China indemnity bill is concerned.

Mr. COX, of New York. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that only the two bills he has indicated shall be considered.

Mr. CURTIN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated that he desires to call up the French spoliations bill and the Chinese indemnity bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to object.

MERCHANDISE IN BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Mr. ROSECRANS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6757) to amend section 2971 of the Revised Statutes, relating to merchandise in United States public store or bonded warehouse; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENTAL STATIONS.

Mr. ROSECRANS, by unanimous consent, also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, requesting the California delegation to favor the bill for the establishment of national experimental stations connected with the agricultural colleges; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

Assembly concurrent resolution No. 10, relative to the establishment of experimental stations in connection with agricultural colleges.

Whereas there is now pending before Congress a bill to establish national experimental stations in connection with the agricultural colleges of the various States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their utmost endeavor to secure the passage of said bill.

Resolved, That the governor of the State of California be requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives.

H. M. LA RUE,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN DAGGETT,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

THOS. L. THOMPSON,
Secretary of State.

F. G. SCHWATKA AND AMELIA SCHWATKA.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 264) for the relief of F. G. Schwatka and wife, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to F. G. Schwatka, sr., of Salem, Oreg., and to Amelia Schwatka, his wife, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,000, to be equally divided between them, in full of their claim against the Government of the United States for their donation claim taken by the War Department, in sections 6 and 7, in township 8 north, range 10 west of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon, and what is now known as Fort Stevens.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this was before the House in the last Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. It is the same bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the facts are not very fresh now in the recollection of members, I hope the gentleman from Oregon will be permitted to make a short statement in regard to them. I do not remember the exact character of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon will be permitted to make an explanation, subject to objection.

Mr. GEORGE. The object of this bill is to pay old Mr. Schwatka and his wife, the aged parents of Lieutenant Schwatka, of Arctic fame, for the Oregon donation land claim which was taken by the United States military authorities for a military reservation in 1852, with the promise at the time that they should be paid for it. They have never received their pay, although continuously applying for relief. Bills have been favorably reported a number of times, in one House or the other, to pay this claim, yet they have not received their money. This bill has twice passed the Senate. As to the value of this property, I suppose the United States would not to-day take $100,000 for it. It occupies a commanding position at the mouth of the Columbia River, having the same relative position to that river as the headlands in San Francisco adjacent bear to the Golden Gate, lands for which the United States paid from $100,000 to $200,000.

Under this bill these parties will be paid $6,000 for their land where now stands Fort Stevens. This in reality is only part compensation for this valuable tract of land which has been taken away from them, and for which they have not received a penny during all these long years.

There certainly can be no objection to the bill; there has been none on the part of any committee that has considered it. It has been unanimously recommended to the House by the Committee on Claims, and I trust we shall no longer delay justice to this aged couple. Mr. Schwatka is now over 80 years of age, and has recently suffered two amputations of a broken leg. He is now, I understand, on a bed of sickness, and at best has but few more years for this world. I trust this House will accord me its unanimous consent to consider and pass this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understand correctly, this land was entered either under the homestead or the pre-emption law.

Mr. GEORGE. Under the Oregon donation-land act which was a special act applicable to the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington.

Mr. HOLMAN. And before these parties had perfected their title the Government took the property?

Mr. GEORGE. The military authorities of the United States came and took possession of it, promising that these parties should be paid for their land.

Mr. HOLMAN. Had they made improvements?

Mr. GEORGE. They had been living on this land two years, cultivating and improving it all that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GEORGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WELLBORN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 31st of May, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills and resolutions reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs and bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table over which said committee has jurisdiction, the bills and resolutions to be considered in the order the committee may indicate; this order not to interfere with revenue or general appropriation bills or reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SINGLETON. I shall have to object to that.

LEASE OF LAND TO MICHIGAN FISH COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution H. Res. 135, and that it be now taken up for consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 135) authorizing the Secretary of War to lease certain lands to the board of fish commissioners of the State of Michigan.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is directed and hereby duly authorized to lease to the State board of fish commissioners of the State of Michigan the parcel or strip of land lying north of and adjoining the Saint Mary's Falls Ship-Canal, and between said canal and the rapids of the Saint Mary's River, in the county of Chippewa and State of Michigan, including such portion of the lands reserved for the use of the canal as are not now needed for canal purposes, upon condition that the premises so leased are to be used solely by said commissioners for the culture and propagation of food-fishes and the residence of the employés of the commission, and that the use of said premises by them shall in no way interfere with the use of the same lands for canal purposes whenever required by the United States Government. The Secretary of War is requested to cause the removal of all persons now occupying any part of the said premises on or before July 1, A. D. 1884. The lease to said commissioners shall be rent free and the buildings to be erected by said commissioners shall be first approved by the engineer officer in charge of the canal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope we shall have some explanation of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] desires to reserve the right to object until an explanation has been made.

Mr. COBB. I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia and the House that this joint resolution provides for leasing to the board of fish commissioners of the State of Michigan a strip of land lying north of and adjoining the Saint Mary's Falls Ship-Canal, in Northern Michigan. The proposed lease will not interfere in the least with the use and privileges of the canal. The piece of land proposed to be leased, as the committee has found, is now used only by Indians who visit the falls for the purpose of fishing. The site is very desirable for the location of such fixtures as the fish commissioners of Michigan may require for the purpose of propagating food-fish. The resolution provides that the property leased shall not be used in any way by the fish commissioners to interrupt or injure the rights of the United States in the canal; and that whenever the Government may desire the use of this ground it shall be at once surrendered. The resolution I think is well guarded, and its passage is certainly very desirable under the circumstances.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PERKINS. Yesterday morning when I desired to take from the House Calendar for consideration the bill (H. R. 2047) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas objections were made. Those objections have never been withdrawn, and I ask that the bill may be considered at this time. While it is a matter of vast importance to the parties interested, it is entirely local in its nature, and there is no objection to the measure by those who have examined it.

Mr. MONEY. Let the right of objection be reserved until the bill has been read.

The bill and amendments were read. They were published in yesterday's RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has been read?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting, but simply to say that when the request was made yesterday for the consideration of this bill I then objected because the facts did not appear which I have since learned to exist; that is, that these Indians do not occupy these lands at all, but they are occupied by settlers who have been induced to go there by reason of the acts of the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. They have been occupied by settlers for more than twenty years, who have improved them and developed them. The Indians do not object to this bill; in fact a few years ago they were here through their agent proposing to accept $2.50 an acre for these lands, and this bill proposes to give them $3 an acre because of the lapse of time. They are now getting no use or benefit or enjoyment from these lands, while settlers have been in quiet, undisturbed possession of them for more than twenty years, but they can not get title to them.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand furthermore that the settlers occupying these lands were induced to go there by reason of various official acts of the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the fact. In 1858 the Secretary of the Interior declared that these New York Indians had forfeited their right to these lands. Subsequently a commission was appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to go there and make an investigation, and that commission found that there were something like a hundred or more Indians who had rights to these lands and were entitled to them. The report of that investigation was reviewed by the Secretary of the Interior, and he cut the number down to thirty-two, as provided by this bill. Certificates of allotment were issued to those thirty-two Indians.

Afterward President Buchanan issued a proclamation opening up these lands for settlement, and these Indians have never been in possession of these lands since that time, but they have been held in quiet and undisturbed, I will not say undisputed, possession by settlers, who, however, are unable to obtain title to them on account of the claim of these Indians. No suit has been instituted against the settlers on behalf of these Indians for the purpose of evicting them, and the property has passed from hand to hand by quitclaim deeds. The Indians favor the passage of this bill, which provides that the money derived from the sales of this land shall be paid into the Treasury for the benefit of these allottees or their heirs.

Mr. CHACE. How did the Indians forfeit their right to this land?

Mr. PERKINS. Because, as the Secretary of the Interior decided, they did not go there and possess it. Under the treaty of 1838 the New York Indians were to go there and occupy this land, and the Government was to give $400,000 to pay the expense of moving them there. The Government did not furnish the money, and the Indians, except a few, never went there.

Mr. CHACE. Yes; that is it. The Government made an agreement with the Indians, did not carry it out, and then says to the Indians that they have forfeited their lands.

Mr. PERKINS. The Indians were willing a few years since to accept $2.50 an acre for this land, and we propose by this bill to pay them $3 an acre.

Mr. CHACE. I think this bill should be discussed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] to object.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

BUSINESS OF POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.

Mr. MONEY. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report for present consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CHACE. I will withdraw my objection to the bill of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. MONEY. I ask consideration of the resolution which I have sent up.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] to say he withdraws his objection to the bill called up by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

The SPEAKER. There is another matter now before the House. After that has been disposed of, the Chair will again recognize the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, May 31, after the reading of the Journal, be assigned for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, prior orders excepted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution just read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bills which it is proposed to consider should be named in the resolution.

Mr. MONEY. They are all on the Calendar; there are a number of bills on the Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless the bills are named I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution is not before the House.

NEW YORK INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] withdraws his objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] for the present consideration of the bill to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas. Is there further objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that there were thirty-odd allotments made to the New York Indians.

Mr. PERKINS. The evidence was that thirty-two Indians had gone there and taken possession of some portion of this reservation, and in consequence of that certificates of allotment were issued to them for portions of this land. They have not taken possession of the lands since or asserted the right to occupy them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where are they now?

Mr. PERKINS. Some of them are living in Kansas, some in the Indian Territory, and some perhaps in Wisconsin. It is not known to the settlers where they are, but the bill provides that the money received for these lands shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, so that those entitled to it can go there and obtain it upon proof of their identity.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood the gentleman from Kansas to say that a few years ago some of them were here in relation to this matter. By whom were they represented?

Mr. PERKINS. They were represented by Mr. Cobb, of Kansas, at one time a member of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ah! he represented those who lived in his State; or did he represent some who lived elsewhere?

Mr. PERKINS. He assumed to represent the entire thirty-two allottees, and on their behalf he offered to accept $2.50 an acre, while this bill proposes to give them $3 an acre.

Mr. HAMMOND. Withdraw objection and let it pass.

Mr. WELLER. I hope the gentleman will not do it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has it the recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. PERKINS. He recommended that the settlers should pay $3.45 an acre.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Was there not a commission appointed some years ago to consider this whole subject?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. And was it not agreed that those settlers should have this land on payment of $3.45 an acre?

Mr. PERKINS. A little more than that.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. They did not think it right to give that; they defied the Government and would not pay that amount for land they had no title to. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is a new fact.

Mr. PERKINS. They did not defy the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HUNT. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. RANDALL. I will withdraw it for the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BAGLEY. I renew it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notified the House of the passage of bills of the following titles, in which concurrence was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1004) to accept and ratify certain agreements made with the Sioux Indians, and to grant a right of way to the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company through the Sioux reservation, in Dakota; and

A bill (S. 1496) to accept and ratify certain agreements made with the Sioux Indians, and to grant a right of way to the Dakota Central Railway Company throughout the Sioux reservation, in Dakota.

COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Wednesday, May 14, 1884, the House will take a recess until half past 7 o'clock p. m.; and that the evening of said day be set apart for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Commerce, and Senate bills upon the Speaker's table, relating to the erection of bridges over navigable rivers, as the committee shall designate, and that this special order continue from evening to evening (except Friday evenings) until all such bills on the House Calendar and the Speaker's table shall have been considered and acted upon by the House, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills and special orders heretofore made; and that in the consideration of each bill, and its amendments, not more than thirty minutes shall be consumed in debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. KEAN. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

FRAUDULENT PATENTS.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 4398, a bill (H. R. 6758) authorizing the Attorney-General to institute proceedings touching land, mines, or mill sites when a patent has been fraudulently obtained; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back adversely the following bills; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 4849) compelling the residents of one State to attend as witnesses in the courts of another State; and

A bill (H. R. 5000) relating to suits by the United States to set aside land patents.

COUNTERFEITING.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported, as a substitute for H. R. 3985, a bill (H. R. 6759) to define and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, or other securities of foreign governments, and of banks and corporations authorized by the laws of said governments; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back adversely joint resolution (H. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. REED presented the views of the minority; which were ordered to be printed with the majority report.

ROCK ISLAND AND DAVENPORT BRIDGE.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 4992, a bill (H. R. 6760) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Rock Island, Ill., and Davenport, Iowa, and to establish it as a post-route; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE AT ANOKA.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4489) to authorize the construction of a highway bridge across the Mississippi River at Anoka, Minn., above the Falls of Saint Anthony; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE AT TONAWANDA, N. Y.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported, as a substitute for H. R. 5098, a bill (H. R. 6761) respecting a bridge at Tonawanda, in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE OVER MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported, as a substitute for H. R. 2385, a bill (H. R. 6762) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at a point between the north and south lines of the county of Douglas, in the State of Nebraska, and to make the same a post-road; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. CLARDY, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 171) approving the charter by the General Assembly of the Choctaw Nation to the Poteau Slackwater Navigation Company; and the same was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PUGET SOUND COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. GLASCOCK, from the Committee on Commerce, reported—in lieu of the following bills, which were ordered to lie on the table, namely, the bill (H. R. 4366) making the city of Seattle, in Washington Territory, in the Puget Sound customs district, a port of delivery; and the bill (H. R. 4367) making the city of Tacoma, in Washington Territory, in the Puget Sound customs district, a port of delivery—a bill (H. R. 6763) making the cities of Tacoma and Seattle, in Washington Territory, in the Puget Sound customs district, ports of delivery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER WATER POWER AND BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. LONG, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 5766 a bill (H. R. 6764) to authorize the Mississippi River Water-Power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER NEAR FORT SNELLING.

Mr. LONG, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 5436) to authorize the construction of a foot, carriage, and railroad bridge across the Mississippi River at some point between Fort Snelling and the Falls of Saint Anthony, in the city of Minneapolis, in Minnesota; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF JOHN E. WHEELOCK AGAINST VENEZUELA.

Mr. LAMB, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. Res. 237) in reference to the claim of John E. Wheelock, a citizen of the United States, for imprisonment by the Government of Venezuela; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAMB. I ask unanimous consent that this report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done under this call. Under this call the committees report simply for reference to the calendars.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I ask for the reading of the resolution appended to the report, which is very brief.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be directed to bring to the attention of the Government of Venezuela the claim of John E. Wheelock, a citizen of the United States, for indemnity for gross outrages and tortures inflicted upon him by an officer of said Venezuelan Government, and to demand and enforce in such manner as he may deem best an immediate settlement of said claim.

INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

Mr. HITT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back the joint resolution (H. Res. 225) to authorize the President to appoint a commission to the international prison congress; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. ROSECRANS, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6307) for the relief of George Baldy; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ROSECRANS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported with adverse recommendations, bills of the following titles; which were severally ordered to be laid on the table, and the accompanying reports printed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 5748) to correct the military record of Daniel McAlpin, a soldier of the war of 1812; and

A bill (H. R. 193) to fix the date of entry into the military service, and to correct the military record of officers now in the regular Army who served as officers of volunteers and regular Army; and

A bill (H. R. 54) authorizing the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Private Earnest Beechner.

JOHN S. CHISM.

Mr. OURY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported with amendments the bill (H. R. 1699) for the relief of John S. Chism; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN FLETCHER.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 429) for the relief of John Fletcher; which was reported to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHEROKEE INDIAN LANDS, ETC.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, also reported back a resolution and sundry memorials of citizens of the Indian Territory referring to lease of lands to citizens of the United States, and to the disbursement of $300,000 by Cherokee authorities; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CYRENUS BEERS AND OTHERS.

Mr. SKINNER, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported with amendments the bill (H. R. 5911) for the relief of Cyrenus Beers, or his personal representatives, and also the personal representatives of Vail and Robinson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. G. FILL AND OTHERS.

Mr. FINERTY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported with amendments the bill (H. R. 2684) for the relief of J. G. Fill, Elwood Hoopes, and George Burnham; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DELAWARE INDIANS.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 5991) to pay the Delaware Indians the amount ascertained to be due them for stock under provisions of the fourteenth article of the treaty of July 4, 1866; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SIOUX OR DAKOTA INDIANS, MINNESOTA.

Mr. STEVENS also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was recommitted the bill (H. R. 842) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amounts due to citizens of the United States for supplies furnished to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof, reported the same with further amendments; which was referred to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DELAWARE INDIAN LANDS, KANSAS.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, also reported back the bill (H. R. 5990) to pay the Delaware Indians the value of certain lands in Kansas, in compliance with treaty stipulations; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MARRIAGES IN UTAH TERRITORY.

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Territories, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 946, a bill (H. R. 6765) to provide for the manner of solemnizing marriages in the Territory of Utah and to provide for the recording of certificates of marriages therein, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR submitted the views of the minority of the committee on said bill; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the committee.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT SCOTT, KANS.

Mr. PUSEY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 2067) for the erection of a public building at Fort Scott, Kans.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BOARD OF EDUCATION, HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Education, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 1625) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey by deed to the board of education, district of Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, a lot of ground numbered 2, in block 13, with buildings thereon; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the amendment and report, ordered to be printed.

COLORED SCHOOL, MORGANTOWN, N. C.

Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Education, also reported, as a substitute for H. Res. 107 for the relief of the first common-school district (colored) for Burke County, North Carolina, a joint resolution (H. GEORGE D. GUTHREY.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5922) for the relief of George D. Guthrey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RUTH STRATTAN.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5923) granting a pension to Ruth Strattan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH H. LAWLER.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 229) granting a pension to Elizabeth H. Lawler; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CATHERINE H. GLICK.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6514) for the relief of Catherine H. Glick; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, order to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 315) granting a pension to Joseph C. Arnold;
A bill (H. R. 4378) for the relief Josephine D. Hellyer;
A bill (H. R. 5011) granting a pension to Frederick Fehlhaber; and A bill (H. R. 3883) for the relief of Charles A. Sugg.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back the bill (H. R. 1832) for the relief of Rufus Barker, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

J. H. IVERS, ALIAS J. H. WILSON.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6399) granting a pension to John H. Ivers, alias John H. Wilson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANN LUMPHREY.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 5762) for the relief of Ann Lumphrey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendment and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ABEL J. LEWIS.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5951) granting a pension to Abel J. Lewis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. ANNA J. FOSTER.

Mr. WINANS, of Michigan, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported, as a substitute for H. R. 5651, a bill (H. R. 6766) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Anna J. Foster; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZA A. SHEALEY.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION OF 1877.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have been instructed by the Committee on the Library to report the following for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, to be added as an item in the sundry civil appropriation bill:

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase the painting of the Electoral Commission of 1877 by Mrs. C. Adele Fassett, $15,000.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order during this call.

Mr. SINGLETON. I present it only for reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I should like also to add another amendment to that, to go to the Committee on Appropriations, for the purchase of a portrait of Rev. Ashbel Green, D. D., Chaplain of the First Congress.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order at this time. The Chair is calling committees for reports.

Mr. SINGLETON. Let my amendment go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. It is referred, the Chair hearing no objection.

DELAY IN ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, submitted a report under the resolution of the House that the Committee on Enrolled Bills be instructed to inquire into and report the cause of the delay in forwarding to the President for his approval joint resolution passed on the 11th instant appropriating $300,000 for the relief of the sufferers by the floods of the Ohio River; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

NORTH GERMAN LLOYD STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 721) for the relief of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business of yesterday. At the time the House took a recess the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; and pending that he also moved that the debate be limited to one minute, to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] moved an amendment to limit the debate to twenty minutes, on which the previous question was demanded.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, which is to limit the debate to twenty minutes instead of one minute.

The question was taken.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 84.

A MEMBER. Tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. We may as well have the yeas and nays at once.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that will not be demanded.

Mr. RANDALL. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia I will not insist upon the demand.

Mr. REED. This is only on a question of twenty minutes' debate.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. And ten of them to be given to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the demand.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion to limit debate to twenty minutes was not agreed to.

The motion to limit debate to one minute was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CONVERSE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill, and by order of the House general debate has been limited to one minute.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, there is but a single remark I wish to make in reply to what was said by the gentleman from Maine—his remark in reference to this side of the House following my lead in regard to appropriation bills. I think it due to myself to say that in reference to the pending bill my judgment as to the amount involved and as to the manner of its expenditure has been made up by the opinion of the gentlemen who feel with me politically as to the proper appropriation of the money, and that I have in no particular taken any initial step in this relation except such as was founded upon their judgment, and not resting upon my own opinion. In other words, I recognize that in this particular I am but voicing the opinion and the judgment and the convictions of the majority upon this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon the amendments of the Senate has been exhausted.

The Clerk will now report the several amendments of the Senate, which will be considered as non-concurred in as they are reached, unless objection is made and a separate vote demanded.

Mr. CALKINS. That will be satisfactory. Then when the amendment is reached on which it is desired to have a separate vote it can be called for.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course.

The amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, and 40 were read and severally non-concurred in.

Amendment of the Senate numbered 41 was read, as follows:

To complete the ordnance outfit of the three new steel cruisers and one dispatch boat, $500,000.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I believe there will be five minutes allowed on either side on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the Committee on Appropriations that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union do non-concur in this Senate amendment. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will ask, in the event of a motion being made to concur in this amendment No. 41, whether debate is not in order for five minutes for and against it?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to concur would of course take precedence, and would be debatable under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RANDALL. Was not the debate limited by order of the House on all of the Senate amendments to one minute?

Mr. REED. That referred only to the general debate. Of course the debate on each amendment under the five-minute rule would still remain.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the motion to apply to general debate only.

Mr. KASSON. It could not possibly cut off the five-minute debate in that way.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understand, then, that the motion to concur takes precedence of the motion to non-concur?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so held.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I move to concur in amendment No. 41, which has just been read; and I simply desire in support of that motion to say——

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the debate has been closed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Only the general debate. I ask the Chair to rule whether a motion to concur is not open to debate under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already so held.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In support of this motion I simply desire to say that I am voting to non-concur in all of the amendments of the Senate which have been incorporated in this bill, and expect to continue to do so throughout the bill, except as to this single amendment. This amendment providing an amount of money, as specified therein, was placed upon the bill on the recommendation of the Navy Department, together with supplementary statements made from that Department and on motion in the Senate Chamber of a distinguished Senator from my own State. We have now commenced the construction, and we have finished one, of these four vessels, costing in the aggregate three millions in money. This amendment of the Senate simply proposes to provide the armament and put it upon these ships when completed. I did not vote for the construction of these ships. I did not favor that policy at the time the law was passed. But, sir, with three millions of money invested already, I, for one, am not willing to go before the country refusing an appropriation of $500,000 for the purpose of making these vessels available in providing armament for them to carry.

Gentlemen may determine it for themselves. For myself I shall not refuse, when the Senate proposes to provide the armament for the vessels already in construction, to give the sum of money found necessary for that purpose.

I therefore move to concur in this amendment, for I do not want the House or any part of it to stand before the country refusing to man with guns the ships that have already been appropriated for and partially constructed.

I yield whatever time remains to me to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes and a half of his time remaining.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. When the naval appropriation bill was pending in the House in Committee of the Whole I intended to discuss the matter of the appropriations for ordnance. I was, unfortunately, ill during the whole week, and was therefore not able to do what I had intended to do at that time, and to say to this House that I had made the most careful examination of the figures submitted by the Ordnance Bureau with reference to the arming of the new cruisers now under way, and I satisfied myself that every dollar which they asked for, amounting, if I remember rightly, to $466,000, was absolutely necessary in order to put guns upon the new ships under way. I was very sorry when I found the bill went out of the House without that provision contained in it. I trust now, without regard to party and without regard to the other questions involved in these amendments, this House will see to it, as to ships for which we have paid the money, on which we must lose the interest until these guns are put upon them, that the money is provided by the action of this committee.

There are other questions behind this on which I am in full accord with the Appropriations Committee. I believe the monitors are a total failure. I believe every dollar spent on them is wasted, and I shall never vote, as I never have voted, a single dollar in behalf of the monitors.

I also believe we ought not to build any new cruisers until we know whether those now under way are good for something or not. But we can not tell whether they are good or not until we put guns on them and float them and try what they can do in the open ocean.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is recognized.

Mr. BLOUNT. I trust this side of the House will do for the Appropriations Committee of this House what has been done heretofore by whatever party has been in control of it. The committee have recommended a bill which has passed the House. The Senate has seen fit to make amendments thereto. It has come back; and the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], expressing the unanimous voice of his committee, has asked to-day a usual thing, to vote to non-concur and bring together the conferees of the House and Senate in conference to settle the differences between the two Houses. That is all there is in this question; and I trust that the majority of this House, whatever their opinion may be as to whether or not the armament shall be placed on these vessels, will not strike their committee this unusual blow. For one, sir, I am willing to trust it; and I will say, notwithstanding the taunts that have come from the other side of the House on the matter of expenditures and what the Government needs, the people of this country from one end of it to the other are as willing to trust the distinguished gentleman now in charge of this matter as any other man in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I care not how we may differ upon other matters, it is due to that committee to follow this usage. It is said, sir, we should place the armament upon these vessels at once. It is said, "Why invest the money in these ships and not place them at once in service? Where is your commerce? Are there not any of your vessels lying in ordinary?" If it should so happen to these, is it an unusual thing? It is constantly happening; and should it happen to these vessels there is nothing very wonderful about it.

Again, sir, I do not wonder that gentlemen on this and the other side of the House should be insisting on making the expenditures as large as they can at this time in view of the Presidential election. It has not always been their policy. In 1859 and 1860 Mr. SHERMAN, now a distinguished Senator, led the opposition to the Democracy in this House, and they were constantly doing what is said to be so heinous in us. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, the estimates for the Navy were $14,000,000; the appropriations were $14,000,000; the expenditures were $14,000,000. In the next year the estimates were $13,000,000, and the appropriations $10,000,000. The estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1861, were $11,000,000, and the appropriations were brought down to $9,000,000. All that while there was great complaint against the extravagance on the part of the Democratic party. The other party insisted that $9,000,000 was sufficient for the Navy. Now they are clamorous for unusual and extraordinary expenditures. I hope, sir, that this House will trust its own committee in conference with the Senate conferees.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask the gentleman from Colorado to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BELFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CALKINS. I only want to say, in reply, that while the minority of the Committee on Appropriations did consent to non-concurrence in these amendments, they are nevertheless all of them individually in favor of concurrence in this item at the earliest practicable moment, and our assent to the recommendation of the committee was for the purpose of bringing about that result when we could. We are ready to vote for it at any time.

Mr. BELFORD. I will never forget the intense excitement I went through during the war, when I was a mere boy; and I want to express my sense of the great service that was performed by the Monitor so discredited by the gentleman from New York. I think it was the Merrimac that came down the James River armed and loaded, capable of attacking New York or Philadelphia; and Mr. Ericsson, with a provident genius, constructed a little monitor, and with that monitor we destroyed the aggressive power of the rebellion.

It is a beautiful spectacle to see the distinguished gentleman from New York standing here and endeavoring to discredit an invention of that kind. That is only equaled by the cowardice and cupidity of the Democratic party with reference to the expenditure of money for the building of our Navy. Does that gentleman dare to stand on the floor of this House and in the face of the potent, visible, and supereminent fact that the little Monitor saved our country practically on the waters, endeavor to discredit that vessel? I would like to see him stand here and assume the responsibility of such a declaration of discredit. He had better look after his iron-works. [Laughter.]

We will try to look after our Navy. I tell you, gentlemen [passing down the aisle and over to the Democratic side of the House amid great laughter], I tell you gentlemen from the South and the West, and I say it with boldness and courage, that if you follow out the policy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] you will not see the glimmering of the gloaming in the next Presidential election. [Laughter on the Republican side.] What we want is liberal appropriations to construct our Navy. [Laughter on the Democratic side, and cries of, "Of course!"] Yes, sir; that is what we want. How are we going to compete with England or with any other foreign nation?

Have you not got the money in the Treasury? You Democrats have the majority in this House. Yet this gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL], proposes to cut down, to cheese-pare, to peanut this whole business, so that if we should get into a war we will not be able to compete with any foreign nation on the face of this earth.

I am appealing to you Democrats to do what is right and just and liberal to this country when you have the power; because if you do not do it, I assure you that you will not carry the next Presidential election, and it would be absolutely immaterial whom we may nominate. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. How much do you want in Colorado of this money for a navy?

Mr. BELFORD. We do not want a cent in Colorado.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee think that this amendment should be non-concurred in and should go into a conference, with the other questions relating to the rearmament of the Navy.

Mr. BELFORD. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] that the amendment of the Senate, No. 41, be concurred in.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 114, noes 92.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. RANDALL said: I desire to give notice now, so that members may not go away, that I shall ask a yea-and-nay vote in the House on this amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman call for tellers?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not; I only give notice that I shall call for a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

The CHAIRMAN then announced the vote and stated that the amendment of the Senate had been concurred in. [Applause on the Republican side].

The next amendment of the Senate, on which a separate vote was asked, was amendment No. 42, to insert the following:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with the assistance of the gun-foundery board, which is hereby revived, to report to Congress, on the first day of the next ensuing session, a plan and estimate for the preparation and purchase of plant for a gun-factory to complete guns from 6-inch caliber to 16-inch caliber, including buildings and shrinking-pit, and to report the full and detailed estimate for the cost of the work aforesaid, and whether the same can be better and more economically performed in establishments owned by the Government, or by private contract, or by a combined system, whereby the said work can be accomplished partly by the Government and partly by private contract, and in what annual installments the said appropriations can most economically be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move that the amendment be concurred in; I think that ought to be done. I will state that this amendment of the Senate proposes to revive a board organized under the naval appropriation bill of March, 1883. That board has visited the ordnance founderies and gun-factories of all the European nations, and has sought and obtained a great deal of valuable information, which is contained in their report to the Secretary of the Navy, which has been submitted to Congress.

The most important thing in that report is this: the board states that they visited the gun-founderies of France, of England, of Austria, and of Prussia; but the most important statement made by them to this American Congress was that they were not allowed to visit the great Krupp gun-works, and therefore could make no report to Congress as to the capacity of that establishment.

It is a fact acknowledged by all intelligent men that no matter what class of vessel you may build, they can not be constructed so as to resist the highest-power guns that have been manufactured and are being now manufactured. This government with its population of 50,000,000 people, the richest government to-day on God's earth, is without a single high-power gun, and if we were to have war to-morrow we would be without means of defense against other nations. The answer which may be made to gentlemen who say when their attention is called to this fact that we can buy guns when needed is that such a dependence is entirely fallacious, because if we should have war with a foreign nation we never could get guns here.

It is important that this Government should have a gun-foundery of its own, and that Congress should appropriate the money for that purpose. We ought to have all the information we can get on this subject. I therefore ask the House to concur in the amendment of the Senate which proposes to revive and continue this board. It will not cost the Government a single dollar outside of the traveling expenses of the members of the board, because the original proposition provided that they should receive no pay outside of their salaries as officers of the Army and Navy.

That board has reported that we should have two gun-founderies, one for the Army and one for the Navy. The amendment of the Senate provides for only one. I do not object to that. But I do say that as a matter of public policy, and also as a matter of economy, as will be demonstrated to this country in time to come, this amendment should be concurred in. And not only that, but whenever this board shall report to Congress where this gun-foundery should be established, no matter what it may cost, the Government should appropriate the necessary amount of money to provide an establishment for constructing guns of the highest power known to the world.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a question of policy involved in this amendment which should have consideration in conference: whether this Government shall at its own expense and at an enormous cost acquire a plant for the manufacture of these guns or whether that should be left to the enterprise of private manufacturers.

The experience of the Government in this connection, so far as I have been able to learn, has not been favorable. In 1862 the Government erected a shop or, as I suppose it may be said, established a plant for work of this character at the Washington navy-yard, the cost, as I am advised, having been $400,000. But the results of that expenditure have not reached the expectations of those who were zealous in its advocacy. I think, in view of all that has occurred in the past as to appropriations in this direction, this matter had better be left to the discretion of a conference committee. I hope therefore that the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations in favor of non-concurrence will be agreed to.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to state that concurrence in this amendment will not involve a single dollar of additional expense. The object is only to have a report made to this Congress by the board already authorized.

In answer to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] that our experience in matters of this kind has been unfavorable, I wish to say that according to the report of this board the French Government encourages the manufacture of steel, and it makes the guns. Now, in this country, while there is encouragement as to the manufacture of steel, capital does not receive sufficient invitation from Congress to undertake the manufacture of these guns.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken. There are in this country two parties entirely capable of making guns of the largest practicable caliber.

Mr. TALBOTT. This whole subject has been heretofore investigated by the Committee on Naval Affairs, who came to the conclusion that the Government has never given sufficient encouragement for the investment of capital in the manufacture of guns, and without such encouragement no one is going to establish a gun-factory.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch exactly the last words of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT]. He is my colleague upon the Committee on Naval Affairs. But I do not understand that this subject has come before that committee in any formal way at this session or that we have passed upon it at all.

Mr. TALBOTT. I did not mean to make such a statement.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, whenever I am in doubt about an amendment of the Senate to an appropriation bill I vote to non-concur. I will not take such a doubtful matter from the hands of an intelligent committee on appropriations or a well-informed conference committee. Why should we eo instanti concur in an amendment to carry out the ideas of the Senate? Rather leave it to the conferees to make the best arrangement possible in the interest of the people as expressed in this popular body.

Some years ago I argued in favor of making guns of small and large caliber; not for cruisers of this class, but for fortifications and coast protection. I know that we must prepare in time for the manufacture of such guns. To make a large gun like the Krupp ordnance occupies not only months but years. When this matter comes back matured, as I trust it will, from the committee of conference, we shall know better how to vote, and at that time I shall speak more at length upon it, for I have given it considerable study.

I can not agree with the idea of my colleague upon the Committee on Naval Affairs that because of some little previous legislation we should now upon an appropriation bill adopt the plan of the Senate. It is wise to distrust the Senate on appropriation bills. Our fathers distrusted the Senate on "money bills." Our constitution-makers distrusted that body in such matters as a body aloof from the people. Nor, sir, am I in favor, especially in a Presidential year, of giving so much money and such perilous power to the dominant party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore I am a little delicate about yielding to all these cunning monetary amendments of the Senate on bills of this character.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I did not mean to say that the Committee on Naval Affairs in this Congress had investigated this subject, and I did not so state. The Committee in the Forty-seventh Congress did investigate it.

Mr. STORM. Who was chairman of that Committee in the Forty-seventh Congress?

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Harris, of Massachusetts.

Now, sir, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] appear reluctant to trust the administration with the expenditure of money in naval matters. I submit it is proper we should have a Navy; and we have no right to say that any one man, or two men, or three men shall stand in the way to prevent our doing what public opinion demands and public necessity requires. We should have a Navy.

So far as the present amendment is concerned it does not appropriate a dollar. It proposes simply to continue the board of Army and Navy officers who are now serving without any extra pay. It is proposed simply that this board submit to Congress a plan, with specifications, for the construction of a gun-factory. That is the whole effect of the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to suggest one difficulty in connection with this matter. Among these officers of our Army and Navy there are at least two in one or the other branch of the service who have an enormous number of patents in connection with the manufacture of guns. Hence it is a question of great concern where the construction of these guns should be lodged, whether it should be left to individual enterprise or whether the Government should have a plant of its own. If the Government is to have a plant of its own, these officers should be restrained from receiving any extra emolument in connection with the manufacture of these guns. I know very well that a distinguished citizen of my own State, Admiral Dahlgren, once invented a gun which was said to be practically beyond the power of powder to burst. But with this exception our experience in the manufacture of guns—the Rodman guns and others—has not been such as to create confidence, in my mind at least, as to the propriety of the Government entering upon a large expenditure of money in the manufacture of this class of guns.

Mr. TALBOTT. I should like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the interest of Army officers there is a provision of law contained in the Revised Statutes that no officer of the United States Army or Navy can receive one particle of payment from the United States Government for any patent he makes.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think that statute is as far-reaching as the gentleman states it, but at all events it might bear the investigation of the conference committee.

Mr. TALBOTT, by unanimous consent, withdrew his formal amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was then non-concurred in.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was asked is as follows:

To enable the President to strengthen the naval establishment of the United States the sum of $2,500,000 is hereby appropriated, to be expended as follows and under the following limitations: For the construction of one cruiser of 4,500 tons displacement, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, one dispatch vessel of 1,500 tons, two heavily armed gunboats of 1,500 tons each, and one light gunboat of 750 tons, and one gunboat, not to exceed 900 tons; this boat to be built on plans and specifications to be furnished by the Admiral of the Navy, and under his supervision and directions, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy; one steel ram, as recommended by the first naval advisory board, November 7, 1881; one cruising torpedo-boat, advocated by the same board and by the present advisory board in its memorandum of November 21, 1882; and two of the harbor torpedo-boats recommended by said first board and in the report from the Bureau of Ordnance of November 1, 1883, all of which are recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy. And, under existing law, it shall be the duty of the advisory board appointed in conformity with an act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, approved August 5, 1882, to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy, in his office or elsewhere, in all matters referred to them by him relative to the designs, models, plans, specifications, and contracts for said vessels in all their parts, and relative to the materials to be used therein, and to the construction thereof, and especially relative to the harmonious adjustment, respectively, of their hulls, machinery, and armament; and they shall examine all materials to be used in said vessels, and inspect the work on the same as it progresses, and have general supervision thereof, under the direction of said Secretary. But said board shall have no power to make or enter into any contract, nor to direct or control any officer of the Navy, the chief of any bureau of the Navy, or any contractor. Neither of the vessels hereby authorized to be built shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof, in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers, shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved, in writing, by said board, or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy; and after said drawings and specifications have been provided, adopted, and approved as aforesaid, and the work has been commenced, or a contract made for it, they shall not be changed in any respect, when the cost of such change shall in the construction exceed $500, except upon the approval of said board, or a majority of the members thereof, in writing, and upon the written order of the Secretary of the Navy; and if changes are thus made, the actual cost thereof and the damage caused thereby shall be ascertained, estimated, and determined by said board; and in any contract made pursuant to this act it shall be provided in the terms thereof that the contractor shall be bound by the determination of said board or a majority thereof, as to the amount of the increased or diminished compensation said contractor shall be entitled to receive, if any, in consequence of such change or changes. And for the construction of all which vessels the Secretary of the Navy shall invite proposals from all American ship-builders and builders of machinery who shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that within three months from the date of the contract their ship-yards will be equipped for building and repairing iron and steel steamships, and constructors of marine engines, machinery, and boilers; and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to construct said vessels and procure their armament at a total cost for each not exceeding the amounts estimated by the naval advisory board; and in the event that such vessels, or any of them, shall be built by contract, such building shall be under contract with the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders, made after at least sixty days' advertisement, published in five of the leading newspapers of the United States, inviting proposals for constructing said vessels, subject to all such rules, regulations, superintendence, and provisions as to bonds and security for due completion of the work as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, with the advice and assistance of the naval advisory board, and in all respects in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882, except as they are hereby modified; and the authority to construct the same shall take effect at once: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall utilize the national navy-yards, with the machinery, tools, and appliances belonging to the Government there in use, in the building of said ships, or any parts thereof, as fully and to as great an extent as the same can be done with advantage to the Government.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to amend the amendment of the Senate by adding the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That at least three of the vessels herein provided for shall be constructed in the navy-yards of the United States.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will see the propriety of adopting this amendment before concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and I desire to have that amendment to the amendment carried because I believe the navy-yards of the country are better adapted this day to construct these vessels than are the shipyards of private ship-builders. I think if the Government builds three of these ships in the navy-yards of the United States we will have vessels which will test from day to day, which are superior in construction to those built in private ship-yards or those constructed in the navy-yards of the country. I believe to-day the Government navy-yards generally are better equipped for this purpose, and I know very well, sir, and I think every member of the committee knows, that the naval vessel built in a navy-yard is built a complete ship, to last, because the cost is not absolutely limited, while vessels built by contractors, although they will be built according to the very word and letter of the contract, yet would not be built as vessels which are paid for by day's work in Government navy-yards and over which is the supervision of officers of the Navy of the United States.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the Senate amendment almost gives away the question, and I have no doubt the lines to which I am going to refer were put into the amendment at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy, he knowing that the means of building in the navy-yards are far superior to the means provided in private ship-yards belonging to citizens of the United States.

I will call the attention of the committee to the lines to which I refer. They are lines 467 to 473, page 20 of the bill, and are as follows:

> And for the construction of all which vessels the Secretary of the Navy shall invite proposals from all American ship-builders and builders of machinery who shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy that within three months from the date of the contract their ship-yards will be equipped for building and repairing iron and steel steamships.

They appear to me to be giving away the whole question, and to be an intimation from the Secretary of the Navy himself, not intended perhaps, that the ship-yards of the Government are prepared now to go on with the construction of iron and steel steamships, and that the ship-yards of private builders are not ready.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not disagree with my friend from Pennsylvania altogether, yet I should like to ask him if he knows how many private yards there are in this country where this thing could be done.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I know of two private yards, or rather two were in my mind.

Mr. COX, of New York. Only two?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Let me name you the ones I refer to. I will give you afterward others. I speak of the ship-yards in the locality in which I live. The ship-yards of the Messrs. Cramp, in the city of Philadelphia, the ship-yard of Mr. John Roach, at Chester, Delaware County, in which are building vessels all the year round, and several other ship-yards on the Delaware, also doing a large business. Besides, the Delaware River is the only stream of water in the country fitted for the construction of iron and steel steamships. I would say the two yards mentioned are fully equipped for many purposes, also others on the Delaware; but the Secretary of the Navy, in the language prompted by him, as I said before, and I have no doubt he knows it, says that it would take three months to equip those ship-yards so they could build vessels suited for naval purposes.

There is within a limit of seven or eight miles from the ship-yard of Mr. Roach, and within about the same limit from the ship-yard of the Cramps, located the navy-yard at League Island, which was specifically taken by the Government for the purpose of using it in the building of iron and steel steamships and constructing machinery and armament. The land upon which it is located was given to the Government by the city of Philadelphia and accepted for this kind of ship-building.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. As I was stating, these two leading ship-builders of the city of Philadelphia, or on the Delaware River, are within certainly not more than fifteen miles of each other, and between the two is this League Island navy-yard. There are also other private ship-yards within this limit of distance.

Why, within three months' time after the order is given that navy-yard at League Island, at a very comparative small expense, can be so prepared as to be able to turn out the best-built ships that have ever been constructed for the Navy of this country, or in any other country for any other navy. A very little addition to its present appliances will enable the work to be done now and these vessels to be built in the completest manner.

Sir, it has been attempted to be argued against taking this yard for this purpose, and also in favor of closing it, as contemplated, that it would cost millions of dollars to complete it and to put it in shape to build first-class iron and steel vessels. Now, I want to say here in the presence of this committee and place it on the records that an official who never was at the League Island navy-yard but for a moment, the Secretary of the Navy—for he did make a visit there on the Tallapoosa once, and on that occasion inspected the yard in about an hour—and the commission appointed to investigate the condition of the navy-yards of the country, a commission created for the purpose of advising the closing of certain yards, who did not see much more of League Island than the Secretary, dared to report that it would cost countless millions, I may say, to complete that navy-yard. I say it now in the hearing of this committee, and wherever my voice may be heard, and wherever what I have said may be read, that the men who reported such a statement to this country never did examine the subject, never cared to examine it, but were appointed to follow out the dictates of the Secretary of the Navy, and recommended the closing of that yard and two or three others which have been of the greatest use to this country in the building of our ships or the repairing of them, because of the causeless prejudice existing, which was well-known to that commission before entering upon its duties.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in good faith, and I would like to have the committee agree to the Senate amendment as I have proposed to modify it.

Again, at the very end of this amendment of the Senate the Secretary admits, as will be seen, the fact of numerous costly tools and appliances on hand in the navy-yards of the Government, whereby he proposes to the Senate committee and to the Senate in the consideration of this matter that these useful and valuable tools and materials may be utilized, if not by the navy-yards of the country, that they may take them to the ship-yards of the contractors who get the contracts for the construction of these ships and permit them to use them.

Mr. Chairman, I think the whole of this Senate amendment in that respect displays a total ignorance and total want of information and knowledge of the condition of the navy-yards by the persons who drafted that proposition. I hope that this committee will agree to my amendment. Why, three ships built at the League Island navy-yard, or a single ship if but one is built there, will stand as a model, so to speak, to the proprietors of the private ship-yards, and present a test as between a ship built at one of our Government yards, where we use our own tools and our own appliances and where we have skilled mechanics and laborers capable of building the best ships in the world, as against those which are built by private ship-yards under the contract system. There we have the appliances nearer ready and the ships can be built at no greater expense and in as little time; and although I am well aware that if these contracts are let to our private ship-yards the contractors who get them will live up to their contracts and build the ships according to the conditions demanded, still I hold that if we have the appliances ourselves, as we have, and while we have that class of skilled labor, the best that the country can afford, it is our duty to utilize our yards and our skilled labor, and build our own vessels.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, one listening to the discussion going on with reference to this bill might suppose that we were either in the midst of a war or at least that the declaration of war was deemed to be at hand. Of what great utility would it be if we had the best fleet or the best navy in the world to-day? What would you do with it? We are asked to make large appropriations for the purpose of building up a navy to go the way, I suppose, that all the rest of the money that we have appropriated for the last fifteen or twenty years in that direction has gone. About three hundred and eighty-five or four hundred millions of dollars have been wasted in the manner proposed by those who advocate the re-establishment of the Navy This money had better be appropriated, sir, and devoted to the payment of the public debt, the reduction of the interest-bearing debt of this country, which is a tax upon our people.

And not only that, sir. The great source of weakness to this nation to-day is our public debt, and a reduction of it is its greatest source of strength. That is beyond all comparison to navies or armies; and the gentlemen on the other side of the House will excuse us if, after they have expended in fraudulent contracts and wasteful extravagance nearly half a billion of dollars under pretense of building up a navy, we will not at their bidding intrust so much money to them until we know a little better than we do to-day how it will be expended.

It was suggested by my friend from New York who last addressed the committee that in Presidential years it was not very safe sometimes to expend very large sums of money in this way. A gentleman from California a short time ago addressed this House, and in the course of his remarks held up in his hand a ballot, which he said under the orders of the authorities of the naval establishment in his district the employés of that establishment were compelled to go and deposit and to vote against him as a Democrat.

How much of this money will be spent in that way? Who will have the contract? Who will control it? How many hundreds of laborers will be thus compelled to go and cast their ballots in a particular way or lose their employment?

No, sir. I say it is the duty of this House, a duty we owe to the country, that not a dollar shall be appropriated for any other purpose except the expenditures necessary to carry on this Government; and no election corruption fund should go in on any appropriation bill.

Mr. GIBSON. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether there is anything in the history of American legislation that is more painful than the discussions that have occurred in the last twenty years on the subject of the American Navy.

It has been constantly repeated upon one side or the other—it matters not which side had power—that the Navy was one large mass of corruption, and that the money voted for building up the Navy was used for political and for corrupt purposes.

Let these charges be either true or false, we are confronted with the fact that America, with all of her needs for commerce, with all her immense undeveloped wealth and resources, to-day has no navy to defend her commerce or her trade on the sea. Whether this has arisen from Republican corruption or whether it has arisen from Democratic cupidity or not, we are confronted with this fact to-day; and the question now is, will the Democratic majority of this House declare it is willing to sit still for years to come and allow us to remain without a navy worthy of this great people? I for one, whether the Republican party has been corrupt or not, am willing to stand here and vote for a just, fair, and honest appropriation of the money of the people, that they may have a navy to represent their interests on the waters of the earth.

Mr. HENLEY. How do you know the money appropriated will be devoted to that purpose?

Mr. BLAND. I ask the gentleman from West Virginia, what you would do with a navy if you had it to-day?

Mr. GIBSON. I would put it on the seas.

Mr BLAND. You would let it rot.

Mr. HENLEY. You would have plenty of excursions and plenty of voting at navy-yards in the interest of the party controlling the expenditure.

Mr. GIBSON. I have heard no argument used against building a navy except that it might interfere with the election of some gentlemen in certain Congressional districts.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is a good reason.

Mr. GIBSON. It has been said here that this country does not need a navy. It is a mere begging the question and unworthy of a Representative to say we need no navy because we are not at war.

Mr. BLAND. I would ask the gentleman from West Virginia, what would you do with a navy to-day if you had it? That is the question. What would you do with it?

Mr. GIBSON. I will tell you what we would do with it. We would give our business men confidence to go out in the world and establish trade. We would unlock the labor and the industry of the country. You men who are engaged in bulling and bearing the markets would no longer be able to do so. You know we have no trade, and if we follow your lead we never will have trade. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And now, Mr. Chairman, it is because I desire to see American commerce revived, because I desire to see our commercial interests have some protection, that I am willing and anxious to build up a navy. And if this country has no honest men to expend its money, we had better lower our flag and seek protection under the flag of some other country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. Before the question is put, may I ask whether if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is ingrafted upon the amendment by the Senate there can be separate votes on his proposition and on non-concurring in the amendment as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. There could not be unless a division is demanded.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand a division. I would like to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but not for the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be adopted it would still remain in the power of the committee to vote against the amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not, if the question was taken on the motion as originally made that the committee concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. A division is demanded. The Chair will first take the question on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which the Clerk will again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following proviso:
"Provided, That at least three of the vessels herein provided for shall be constructed in the navy-yards of the United States."

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it in order to move to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. TILLMAN. I make that motion. I am as good a friend of the Navy of the United States as any man on this floor or off of it. It was the traditional policy of my State before the war, inculcated by all her great men, that the United States ought to have a splendid navy but a small army. I am here to persist in that policy as far as I can consistently with my duty as I see it. But this bill as amended by the Senate does not foreshadow that, if the vast sums of money proposed to be set apart by Congress for the Navy should be so set apart, it will be applied honestly for that purpose. On the contrary I assert, and if I had the time I could demonstrate, that it covers a stupendous fraud, fairly to be presumed from recent conduct of the Secretary of the Navy with reference to the eight-hour law, for the purpose of buying the next Presidential election. And that is to be done under the pretext of being the laborer's friend by means of the eight-hour law. Therefore it does not matter whether we adopt the Senate amendment as it stands or take the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL]. I affirm that if either be adopted these ships will be constructed in such navy-yards of the United States as will yield the most good in the way of subsidizing voters in closely contested States in the Presidential election of next November.

What is meant by the eight-hour law? I will venture to remark that there are probably not twenty men on this floor who understand it. I frankly admit that I should not myself understand it thoroughly if I had not been on the Committee on Education and Labor of the Forty-sixth Congress, and have had occasion in the discharge of official duty to study it from its origin to the present day and trace it through slime and corruption in almost every Department of the Government. But, again I ask, what is meant by the eight-hour law? It is well known that from the vernal to the autumnal equinox we have daylight and pleasant weather, so that those engaged in physical labor may work ten hours or twelve hours, and some fourteen hours or even sixteen hours, between dawn and twilight. But from the 21st of September until the 21st of March, excepting where you can use gas or electric lights, and have mineral coal to heat up workshops and factories, eight hours is about all the time that can be used in that way out of the twenty-four, either in private or Government workshops.

In 1868 a Massachusetts statesman, Mr. Banks, for the purpose as I contend of capturing the popular vote among the laboring classes in the then approaching Presidential election, introduced a bill which passed Congress that purported to be an eight-hour law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Thank you, sir. That law passed in 1868 reads in these words:

Eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed, or who may be hereafter employed, by or on behalf of the Government of the United States.

A bald declaration, a mere declaratory law as to what should constitute a day's work for the Government by its employés where there was no contract. There is nothing in it prohibiting the Government and the laborer from stipulating that a day's work shall consist of ten hours or twelve hours of labor. There is no penalty attached to a Government officer for working an employé longer than eight hours, and paying for only the time that he works. In other words, it was a voice and nothing more and intended to deceive.

At the most it only undertook to regulate what might be considered a day's work in the absence of a special agreement, as the Government regulates time by hours and minutes and seconds. But in all Government establishments, where the Government officers chose to do so, they from the passage of the eight-hour law in 1868 down to 1877 claimed authority to require only eight hours' work for ten hours' pay during the six summer months, and many of them so exercised that authority mostly for corrupt political purposes as I believe.

In 1862 Congress passed the following mandatory act in regard to wages:

That the hours of labor and rate of wages of the employés in navy-yards shall conform as nearly as is consistent with the public interest with those of private establishments in the immediate vicinity of the respective yards, to be determined by the commandants of the navy-yards, subject to the approval and revision of the Secretary of the Navy.

Here is a just rule for regulating wages, and it is the law of the land to-day, although it has been omitted from the Revised Statutes. But, notwithstanding, it is still of force.

The Secretary of the Navy, the immaculate gentleman whom it is proposed by these Senate amendments to clothe with almost dictatorial power to put his hand into the Treasury and expend many millions as he sees fit, has lately assumed the responsibility of violating that law and spitting upon the interpretation given to the eight hour-law as held by the Supreme Court of the United States. There were so many abuses under this eight-hour act, where real or pretended contractors employed laborers, and the laborers sued the Government, claiming ten hours' pay for eight hours' work, that the matter was carried to the Supreme Court, and that court decided, in the case of Martin, (4 Otto), that it was only a mere declaratory law. And since that time (that decision was rendered in 1877), for the last six years, every officer of the Government and the head of every Department has conformed to that decision and to the act of 1862 regulating wages, until the present Secretary of the Navy commenced about a year ago to defy the statute and trample upon the decision of the court preparatory to using the navy-yards for party purposes in the next Presidential election, to which end he only needs large appropriations.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not time now to answer questions. Let me make myself understood first, and then I will answer any question if you will extend my time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I merely wanted to ask the gentleman if he referred to the Martin case.

Mr. TILLMAN. I so stated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. It is with no little regret, Mr. Chairman, that I see politics introduced into this discussion. In all I had to say yesterday I endeavored to appeal to the good sense and tranquil judgment of members on the theory that patriotism occasionally controls both sides of the House. I am sorry that this morning three gentlemen on the other side have introduced purely party questions of administration into this discussion, and have declared it to be their judgment that we ought not to vote any money for the Navy because the administration which will have the expenditure of that money belongs to the opposite party.

As was said by a Democratic Senator in another place, party hostility to a public officer is not a point which can be made against the demands of the public service. Party prejudices against an administrator appointed under the laws and the Constitution of the country can not justify a refusal of necessary appropriations. Gentlemen know perfectly well that if this were the real cause of their difficulty they could provide further, as they have now provided largely, that the naval advisory board or any commission of naval offices, headed, if you please, by a Democrat or composed of Democrats, should direct the disbursement of every dollar of the fund appropriated. When my honored friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who began patriotically but ended in a partisan spirit, declares that this is a proposition for a fraud, I wish to call his attention to the fact that he has made a charge which rests upon no foundation that he can avow.

Is it a fraud to administer the eight-hour law? Does the Democratic party, represented by him, wish to take the position that this law, so earnestly demanded by the laborers of this country, shall stand in the way of building a navy for the United States? Shall it be an obstacle in the present and in all the future? Is it pretended that the present Secretary of the Navy—with whom, perhaps, no man on this floor has less intimate relations than I—has performed one act of administration that will not bear the most rigid investigation by either side of this House? Knowing him but little, but knowing more of his Department, I challenge that investigation into the minutest act of his administration. Whoever may be at the head of that Department, whether the present Secretary of the Navy or a representative of the Democratic party or of any other political element in this country, it is according to the Constitution and laws our business to intrust him with the expenditure of the moneys needed for the public safety, and especially needed for this great branch of the public service.

Is it to be further maintained, as indicated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], that the laboring men of this country if employed in constructing vessels under this bill are expected to vote against the Democratic party? Have they no independence? The law of the land is different now from what it was years ago, when workmen of this class were assessed by Democratic agents for money to pay election expenses? Does not the gentleman know that we would impeach a Secretary of the Navy or any subordinate officer within the reach of impeachment who should attempt to coerce Government employés into voting for any party against his will?

If you take the ground that no laboring man shall have employment in navy-yards or in the Government service, but shall be starved first, for fear he will vote against you at the next election, we accept that ground of contest and will go before the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLER and Mr. COX of New York addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels bound to recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to have the same extension of time which was conceded to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. CANNON. If the Chair will recognize me I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], and the gentleman from New York can be recognized hereafter.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield my time to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to further call attention to the issue which is raised by the political opposition excited against this bill, the issue avowed this morning, as it was indicated by the gentleman in charge of the bill yesterday. We are told substantially by gentlemen on the other side that whatever interests of the country may be imperiled, they are not willing to have the expenditures for the Navy made under the present administration of the Government. Why, sir, the election is to take place in November, and you may put upon this bill an amendment that no contract shall be made and no money expended until January 1, 1885. Nay, more; if this be the ground of your opposition, you may say that no contract shall be made and no money expended until the 4th of March, 1885, when whoever may have been the choice of the people will become the President of the United States.

I wish gentlemen to see that this defense is hollow when the proposition is to proceed with the work of rebuilding the Navy. I care nothing whether a voter who may be put at work on these ships is a Democrat or Republican. I have never indorsed interference by politicians with the personal rights of voters who are laboring men. I have no record to go back on; I have no protestations of purity to make. When any man of any party shall attempt to dominate by undue influence the vote of any laboring man by threatening his bread, whether that man may be in private or public employment, that moment my vote will be given for whatever punishment of such officer the law will allow.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, we have passed beyond those old days of bosses and of boss rule and dictation of laborers. The moral sentiment of the country everywhere, except possibly the Democratic party in Ohio, which still goes for spoils I take your permission to say, Mr. Chairman, is in favor of following up the principles of civil-service reform, and of delivering the minor employés of Government from the dictation of mere political power. That same spirit reaches into the navy-yards of the country, and will be found operative in the future unless some party shall come into power which takes the ground that civil-service reform is a humbug, and that boss rule is better than the rule of principle and purity.

I renew now the invocation which I made yesterday to eliminate this question from what is an unjustifiable assumption of probable official misconduct, and to let it be determined by the simple rule of what patriotic duty requires of members on both sides of the House. Let us bring back the spirit of the country to that which my honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] represents as the prevailing spirit in the days before the war, which spirit I pray Heaven may yet dominate both sides of the House before the session is over in respect to the Navy of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the invocation of my friend from Iowa, speaking from a political and partisan standpoint, has not impressed this House into sympathetic solemnity. His prayer has not ascended higher than the escutcheon of his own State in the æsthetic ceiling above us. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman prays God that the civil-service reform may go on. He then reads my friend from South Carolina a lecture because that eloquent member imagines that he sees some fraud, I think erroneously, in some supposed eight-hour portion of this bill. But why did not my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], whose hands are so callous with toil—[laughter]—who loves the laboring man with so much ardor, who cares so much for the navy-yards because in them are found the weary mechanic and laborer—why did he not before the elections two years ago, when assessments were made upon the Navy employés to sustain the sinking fortunes of his moral party, enter a protest vigorous enough to have stopped them? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to say that no evidence was presented to prove the charge that assessments had been made in navy-yards. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Just let me say——

Mr. KASSON. I mean on laboring men in the navy-yards.

Mr. COX, of New York. Why, Mr. Chairman, is it not of record that the Secretary of the Republican central committee, the Hon. Jay Hubbell, sat here when his own circular was read? Was its genuineness denied? Was it not read in the presence of the gentleman from Iowa and accepted by him as true—accepted with all the accompanying evidence? I well remember the debate. Why did not the gentleman from Iowa then, instead of making a qualified denunciation of assessments laid on navy-yard employés, life-saving employés, upon the clerks of the Department, upon the little pages on this floor—upon the very hostlers in the Indian school at Carlisle, Pa.—raise his eloquent and prayerful voice in denunciation of the rascality and pollution of his own party? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KASSON. One reason is, I suppose, that it is very difficult to be sincerely pious whenever the gentleman from New York gets the floor. [Laughter.] The other was, as he will remember, I did denounce it if it had been made; and the third is, I still assert neither then nor since, according to my recollection, was a single instance of an assessment upon a laborer in the navy-yards given.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman uses the word "if." Shakespeare says your "if" is a great peacemaker. [Laughter.] I know the gentleman as a diplomat and a debater has great skill. I feel sometimes as another in Shakespeare said: "An I thought he had been valiant, and so cunning in fence, I'd have seen him damned ere I'd have challenged him." [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Iowa winked at these proceedings.

Mr. KASSON. No.

Mr. COX, of New York. But he is not the friend of laboring men. He has no interest in them. His votes show it. I know whereof I speak. I can turn to the record to prove it. But when he compliments our friend from South Carolina about his traditional Carolinian desire for a grand navy, he compliments a gentleman whose words deeply wound the district and city I represent, the party I love, and the laboring and mechanic element of which has made this country the marvel of advancement!

The laboring men of this country have asked little and received less from legislation in our land than any other class. Yet they are the architects of our greatness. War fills a loftier niche in the Pantheon of nations, but labor after all, is the conquering hero. It enriches. It does not spoil. It constructs. It does not mar, unmake, or demolish.

Our men of toil do not bewail their lot, nor whine their woes. They ask not to rust, but to rest. They would not be idle, except to work again with more cheerfulness. To toil is the bitter lot of all: nay, not of all—of the many.

> Such hath it been—shall be, beneath the sun,
> The many still must labor for the one.

These creators of our property and opulence, desire to taste the joy that comes from and after their labor. They crave to be within the charmed circle of social and domestic companionship; not merely as relief from carking care, but for moral and mental recreation and improvement.

The working man is greater than the tools of his trade, more potent than the forces his invention evokes for shortening hours and saving labor and grander than his most marvelous machinery; because he is the microcosin that contains them all. It is his mind and soul as well as his body that craves respite for their enlargement and inspiration. Without it "his saws are toothless and his hatchets lead." Without it he shrivels into the slavish condition of the boorish peasant of Russia or degenerates into the shiftless improvidence of the lazzaroni of Italy.

I can not help, sir, as I look at my Democratic friend from South Carolina, exclaiming, as this stab comes from him, "Et tu, Brute!" [Laughter.] The gentleman from South Carolina refers to a decision of the Supreme Court. He attempts to bolster up his anomalous position by the decision in 4 Otto, page 400. It is the case of Martin. We are all familiar with it. This question was raised in that case, as he alleges. I deny that it was raised or decided in the Martin case.

Mr. Chairman, although Secretary of the Navy Thompson predicated his order of 1877 on this case—compelling eight-hour men to receive a proportionate reduction of wages—yet I believe this Martin case had no merit. It was not pertinent to the order of the Secretary. Martin worked under a special contract. He was paid extra wages, as we know. He then made a claim under the act of May 18, 1872, for additional wages. The claim was adjusted. The amount found due under the act was paid. He gave a receipt in full. Did not this relieve the Government from all further indebtedness?

It is, therefore, not a test case in this connection. But I do claim for the laboring men who make up the great body of my constituents, and the Democratic party, which is largely made up of laboring men, claims also that the law of 1868 should be carried out or repealed. Execute it or repeal it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MCMILLIN was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. COX, of New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am very much obliged to my friend from Tennessee.

That law was passed on the 25th of June, 1868. It enacted that eight hours should constitute a day's work for all laborers, workingmen, and mechanics then employed or thereafter to be employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States. These are its significant words. It is not an ambiguity. It is as clear as the tones of a bell. Finding this law shamelessly neglected, General Grant, the President of the United States, on the 19th of May, 1869, issued a proclamation for its enforcement. He recited the law and directed that no reduction should be made in the wages on account of the reduction of the hours.

I will do further credit to that distinguished soldier and statesman by saying that in May, 1872, he issued another proclamation of the same tenor and with more emphasis as to wages. He said that there should be no reduction on account of wages to the laborers by reason of the application of that law.

Mr. BELFORD. Was he a Republican or a Democrat?

Mr. COX, of New York. He was originally a Democrat and carried into the Republican party some of the good old Democratic law-abiding opinions. These staid by him in his political eclipse.

Republican officials have not always enforced this law. It was not in force at all or very indifferently executed from 1877 to 1883. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, I will do credit to the present Secretary of the Navy. On the 26th of March, 1883, he issued orders for its operation. More than that, he directed that from the 25th day of August to the 19th day of September, 1883, while a certain vessel was under repair at Cramp's ship-yard or in their dry-dock in Philadelphia, the men who were employed ten hours per day should receive wages at the rate of one and one-fourth day's wages for each long day of ten hours. He thereby carried out the law in a most practical and satisfactory way without fraud or juggling. That much I say for the Republican administration of this law.

I therefore say to my friend from South Carolina that if he would fight that law, let him contend for its repeal. Let him not denounce its execution or its executors. It is on the statute. It is unrepealed. General Grant once said that the way to test the value or mischief of a law is to put it in execution. If it was badly conceived its repeal would be the consequence.

Mr. Chairman, I am not now discussing or complaining of this naval appropriation bill because it adds to or takes work from the navy-yards or because it gives work to private yards. I have my opinion, and my constituents have theirs and their interests in that matter. Nor do I complain of the amendment of the Senate because it says or does not say anything about the eight-hour law. There is no allusion to the eight-hour law in this bill. I demand that, if the work is to be done at all on these cruisers or any other vessels, the law shall have its sanctity and vigor vindicated. Let all laws be executed, as well when it concerns the mechanic as when it touches your railroad grandees or bonded millionaires.

What I apprehend in the amendments of the Senate increasing our bill several millions is, as I said before, that as we are in a Presidential year—a year of exceptional excitement and temptation in politics, a year when the very best men might fail to be entirely just, a year when even my distinguished friend from Iowa might perhaps at some frail moment of his administrative existence, if he were a Cabinet officer, almost succumb before the allurements, persuasions, and corruptions of his party. Therefore, sir, in voting money for expenditure during this year is it not best to appropriate carefully? Are these navy-yards, where party leaders have their tape-worm tickets, and by miserable devices, briberies, and intimidation control voters, the purest places for the use of our vast surplus? Is it not best, sir, representing the popular and dominant voice in this House and country, to use the money of the people with heedful provision? Is it not wise to be wary and chary in adopting suspicious amendments that come to us from that unaccountable body our Senatorial House of Peers? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard for a few moments more, because in the pungent and incisive manner of my elegant friend from New York city [Mr. COX] he has seen proper to assume a vein of ridicule in reference to this naval question, and has not properly considered the present condition of the law or its effects upon the independence of laborers in navy-yards.

Now, let me remind the House—for we forget in a few years the condition of the law—that the first movement in the direction of civil-service reform of which we are now speaking was made by the Republican party in this House in 1867 by the act of the 2d of March of that year. It may relieve some misapprehensions on the part of the other side of the House if I read this law. It is now section 1546 of the Revised Statutes:

> No officer or employé of the Government shall require or request any workingman in any navy-yard to contribute or pay any money for political purposes, nor shall any workingman be removed or discharged for political opinion; and any officer or employé of the Government who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be dismissed from the service of the United States.

There is the law which Republicans passed to cure an evil practice which had been inherited from the old Democratic rule of navy-yards.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was any man ever dismissed under that law?

Mr. KASSON. This has been the law since 1867; and if it has been violated I have no personal knowledge of it; as to that I have nothing except the charges made by partisan gentlemen on the other side. But wherever a violation has taken place it has been within the power of the persons knowing of it, if they had the proof of it, to bring it to the attention of the executive government and to demand that the officer violating the law be dismissed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman from Iowa not know that that law was openly violated during the last Congressional election by circulars sent out from this city by the national Republican committee?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Iowa does not know that this section was violated in the last election in a single instance. If any gentleman did know of it, it was his duty to make a record of the fact, to bring it to the attention of the Executive, and to demand the dismissal of the officer.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was known publicly, and the circular sent out has been read from the Clerk's desk here many times.

Mr. KASSON, Oh, no. The gentleman from Illinois confuses different things as to these circulars. By authority of the committee circulars were sent out, but not to the laborers in the navy-yards. There is no charge that a laborer in the navy-yard ever received one of those circulars. If such a thing was done it was done without the authority of the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. All the employés of the Departments received those circulars. That is within the knowledge of everybody.

Mr. KASSON. That has nothing to do with this law which I have read.

Mr. SPRINGER. And they were received by many postmasters throughout the United States.

Mr. KASSON. That is not this law. We are speaking of the navy-yards, and I say the employés of the navy-yards were protected by law.

Mr. SPRINGER. The law will prove as valid to protect them as the other law proves valid to protect others.

Mr. KASSON. We afterward passed in a Republican Congress a law to protect the others. That law I reported myself from the Committee on Civil Service Reform, and it is now in force.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly; with great pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman from Iowa says the law protects the laborer. I want to ask him if the eight-hour law which has been restored in defiance of the statute of Congress and the decision of the Supreme Court by an order of the Secretary of the Navy—if that eight-hour law does not permit him to pay a common laborer in a navy-yard $3 a day for eight hours' work and 75 cents for every two hours additional work, so that he will get $3.75 pay for what a laborer in a private ship-yard doing the same amount of work only gets $3.

Mr. KASSON. That I understand to be, if anything, the direct consequence of the law. The present Secretary of the Navy has done nothing but carry out the law. If he has done more, let him be investigated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENLEY. I think the country will receive with a keen sensation of genuine amazement the statement of the gentleman from Iowa to the effect that employés in navy-yards at the last election were not made the recipients by Mr. Jay Hubbell of these political assessment circulars.

I wish to draw the attention of the gentleman from Iowa and of the House to the fact that a short time antecedent to the last Congressional election Mr. Dorman B. Eaton, well known in civil-service reform circles, published an article in the North American Review, in which he challenged contradiction of the assertion that no one in the employment of the Government of the United States, no person in the civil-service, had escaped assessment by means of these circulars. In the last campaign, upon every stump in my Congressional district from which I addressed the people, I read this article and challenged denial thereof, and asserted that there could not be found upon the rolls of the civil service of this Government a human being who had not received one of these circulars.

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to ask my friend from California one question.

Mr. HENLEY. Not at this time.

Mr. VAN EATON. I wish to say to my friend from California that I did the same thing in my canvass. He is exactly right in what he has stated.

Mr. HENLEY. Exactly. And I further made the same statement in addressing some five or six hundred of the employés of the Mare Island navy-yard in my own district, and challenged denial then and there of the fact, and nobody denied it there.

This gentleman who wrote the article in the North American Review went on to say that every employé of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, from the employés in the light-house at Hell Gate to those at the Carlisle Indian School in Pennsylvania, the pages, the old women in the Departments, every one was the recipient of one of these assessment circulars; and yet the gentleman from Iowa, with a wonderful degree of oblivion of what was going on in the country, which from end to end rang with denunciation of it, and what was so apparent to the intelligence of every one else, tells us that he knew nothing of it.

Mr. BELFORD. Now, will the gentleman allow me to put my question?

Mr. HENLEY. Certainly. The gentleman from Colorado is always at liberty to interrogate me.

Mr. BELFORD. Is it not a fact that during the administration of James Buchanan, which was the last administration you had, he levied assessments on every clerk in every Department, the Navy, Post-Office, Interior, and everywhere else? Is not that the fact?

Mr. HENLEY. I do not know how that may have been. The gentleman was a Democrat himself then, and I do not know how it may have been under the inspiration of his leadership. [Laughter.] It is a little bit further back than I can go. [Laughter.] Now, an attempt has been made upon the other side sedulously to throw the odium——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WELLER. I move to strike out the last word, and will yield my time to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HENLEY. I thank the gentleman. As I was saying, an attempt has been made upon the other side to throw odium upon our side and place us in the attitude of antagonizing the equipment of a navy which should be commensurate with the dignity and glory of this country. The question is whether or not that charge is made in good faith, and whether we are really amenable to it and all that it implies.

The position in which we find ourselves now is simply this (and I intend to resort to such precision and plainness of statement as the subject requires): We find, according to the history of the Republican party heretofore in dealing with the administration of naval affairs, that money has been poured into the lap of that party in the most unstinted abundance; yet what has been the result? It is not a pleasant thing for me to stand up here and detail to the country the results which have followed therefrom. We all know they have been spoliation, theft, and all manner of maladministration.

They now say, "Give us this appropriation and we will not do that any more." Well, we do not know whether you will or not. [Here the hammer fell.] At least we do not care to trust you.

Mr. THOMAS. I rise to address myself directly to the question under consideration, and that is whether or not the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] shall be adopted. I may not be following the general order observed here this morning, but I shall certainly endeavor to bring myself within the rules of the House and of the committee. [Laughter.]

It is proposed by that amendment that one-half of the vessels contemplated by the Senate amendments shall be constructed in the navy-yards of the Government. I am opposed to doing anything of the sort. I am opposed to building one of these vessels in the navy-yards of this country, for the reason that it will cost the Government three times as much to build them in the Government navy-yards as it will to have them built by contract with private establishments. It has been demonstrated and is susceptible of proof that work in the navy-yards of the country has cost $3 where it would have cost only $1 had it been done by contract. I am therefore opposed to this amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. By contract where? In this country or abroad?

Mr. THOMAS. By contracts in this country. My opposition to this amendment is based upon the knowledge of the correctness of what I state after a thorough and conscientious investigation of the subject. The Secretary of the Navy in his last report says:

These establishments—

Government navy-yards—

must first be thoroughly reorganized in such a way as to exclude all political considerations from their management, otherwise bad and expensive work will be the result. We can not afford to destroy the speed of our naval engines in order to make votes for a political party. Whatever other governmental agency may be conducted with partisanship, a great naval workshop, dealing with the hull of a modern steel ship, its fittings and equipment, and with the complexities of its machinery, can not be successfully so managed. No charge of favoring private ship-building establishments should deter any one from asserting that, until the navy-yard workshops are managed on business principles and without regard to politics, the construction and repair of the new American Navy should be committed to those builders who employ or discharge their foremen and all their artisans according to their skill as mechanics and without caring for their political opinions or votes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. From what are you reading.

Mr. THOMAS. I am reading from the last report of the Secretary of the Navy, and I indorse most fully and heartily what he says. It has been urged here during this session of Congress, and was urged during the latter part of the last session of Congress, that in some way, not explained and not explainable, in some mysterious way, if these vessels should be let out by contract the Government would be swindled, or some private ship-building establishment would be benefited to the exclusion of others. Now, I want to say that experience disproves that charge and shows it to be without foundation.

The last Congress authorized the building of three steel cruisers and of a dispatch-boat, and they were required to be built by contract, after full plans and specifications had been prepared and adopted by the advisory board and the Secretary of the Navy and after full opportunity had been given to all builders to bid for the contracts. They were advertised in compliance with the law, and we find that they were bid for by five different firms in this country. They were finally awarded to the man who took the contract to build them for $315,000 less than the amount of the lowest bid, and $774,100 less than the engineers and officers who would have built them in the Government navy-yards estimated they could be built for. Therefore I say that we have before us information to show that the only safe and economical way of building these vessels is to have them built by contract after proper competition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish some gentleman would yield to me five minutes more time.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman, if I can be recognized for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done, if there is no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the gentleman. As I was saying, the contract for constructing these vessels was taken for $315,000 less than the lowest of the five bids and $774,100 less than the estimates made by the board of advisory officers to construct them in the Government navy-yards.

Therefore I say that as business men and as patriots, having at heart the interests of our common country, dealing with this proposition as a business proposition, and in that light alone should it be dealt with, we can not afford to relegate the building of any part of these ships to the navy-yards, especially while it is even possible to charge that they are being used for political ends. There ought to be no politics in this question. The necessity for the rebuilding of our Navy is a national necessity. It is one that appeals to every Representative here, to every citizen throughout the length and breadth of the country. I am sorry that the tocsin has been sounded, the bugle-blast sent forth to Democratic Representatives on this floor that it is not safe to adopt this measure lest by reason of the glory which may follow such action a Republican President might be again elected. Gentlemen, I hope you will not descend to any such demagogical, any such partisan, any such unworthy consideration in dealing with this question. It can not affect the election of a President, and, if it could, there is a greater object to be considered—the protection and preservation of our common country.

I was delighted beyond measure to see the Senate amendment attached to this bill, for I think, as I have before said, that the rebuilding of our Navy is a prime necessity, and that no party considerations should deter us from taking hold of the question in a manly, business-like, patriotic way and carrying on the work to proper completion.

Mr. RANDALL. Unless the Committee of the Whole will give unanimous consent to limit debate on this question I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. What limitation of time does the gentleman propose?

Mr. RANDALL. Ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to closing the debate on this proposition in ten minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I concur with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] in all that he has said in regard to the impropriety of building new ships in the navy-yards of the Government, and I concur heartily with the statement of the Secretary of the Navy in reference to the evils of politics in those navy-yards. I venture to say there is no man in this country who can speak from better knowledge of those evils than the Secretary of the Navy. I expected, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Illinois would bring forward the testimony of Admiral Porter (which gentlemen will find published in the RECORD as a part of the debates at the other end of the Capitol) in regard to the extravagant administration of our navy-yards. There is thus full concurrence of testimony on the part of politicians, of public officers, of mechanics, and of men of business, that work cannot be done in the navy-yards as economically as in private ship-yards.

I concur also in the general proposition that this country wants a navy; that we can not do without it; and notwithstanding the question of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], there is plenty of work for our naval vessels to do provided they are capable of the work, which may come upon them, like a thief in the night, without warning.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the Democrats were in power to-day, and if their own Secretary of the Navy were to expend this money, I should oppose the amendments sent here by the Senate, for the reason that we have now four ships under construction, built upon plans of great novelty, embracing many features that have never yet been tried in men-of-war; and for us, in view of this experiment the result of which can not be determined in less than a year, to go on and appropriate more money before the question is settled whether such expenditure is wise, seems to me monstrous folly.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the only criticisms on those vessels apply to small parts of them—not the larger parts.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman will excuse me. The criticisms extend far beyond the mere details of the vessels. There are some things in those vessels—such as the fire-brick furnaces—which are unknown in ships of war, and it is a very doubtful question whether they will not be found impracticable.

Mr. CALKINS. Those matters can be changed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, they can be changed; but changes in great structures of this kind cost enormous sums of money.

Mr. RANDALL. And involve the breaking of contracts.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, sir.

If we build a navy we do not want to repeat our experience of the past, but to get a good, honest, efficient navy. I will go further, and state to the gentleman from Indiana that it was my fortune during the last summer to visit and carefully inspect the English fleet that had come back from Alexandria after having destroyed that great port. I have studied the plans of those ships as well as I could with my limited knowledge of machinery and ships; and I feel convinced that the vessels which we are building are not equal to those already in the service of other nations. And I was told by the officers of that great fleet which bombarded Alexandria that the British Government would build no more ships of the speed we propose; that it had better ships upon the stocks, that for fast cruisers nothing under eighteen or nineteen miles an hour would be regarded as desirable for the British navy. And let me remind the House that the steamship Oregon has just crossed the ocean at a speed for the whole voyage exceeding eighteen miles per hour, and that not one of our new vessels could keep within sight of her, even if they realize the promises made for them. How can they be called "commerce-destroyers?"

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we ought to pause in this business until we know what we are going to get. I put politics out of the question. This is simply a question of sound judgment and business experience, such as we would apply in our private affairs and ought to apply to these great public expenditures.

But, further, I am not willing to trust the expenditure of this additional money to the present Secretary of the Navy. I will affect no concealment. I will state I know him as a most able, astute politician, and I believe in all expenditures of the public money he is an entirely honest man. Yet, having had some experience of what he will do when he is put in a place of great emergency, I for one——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I hope some gentleman will yield me further time.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will my colleague tell the House to what he refers?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am ready to tell the House to what I refer.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will take the floor and yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRUMM. I object, unless you extend the time generally.

Mr. CALKINS. Do not object to his proceeding.

Mr. BRUMM. I do, unless the time is extended generally.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will take the floor and yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. I insist that the gentleman's time ought not to be extended if these charges are to be made against public officials, one of them, too, a Cabinet officer.

Mr. RANDALL. Your side asked for it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have time and will answer. Under the guidance of my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the last House, a provision was inserted in the appropriation bill by which the Secretary of the Navy was directed to dispose of certain condemned ships and certain ordnance stores which were no longer required for public use. That act was passed in 1882—the precise date escapes me, but I believe it was in August, just before the Congress adjourned. The Secretary was enjoined by that act to pay the proceeds of that sale into the Treasury of the United States. He was not allowed to retain it an hour.

Under a subsequent act passed March 3, 1883, giving similar authority as to vessels, he proceeded to have appraised and condemned a large number of vessels, which were sold in September last, and produced, according to his annual report, something over $300,000, which, added to the sales of condemned stores, made a total of nearly $500,000, which he was bound by law to cover into the Treasury.

Now, when this bill was pending in the House about a month ago I went to the Treasury Department to find whether that money had reached the Treasury. I went through bureau after bureau and no trace of it could be discovered. By the terms of the sale that money was payable to the Secretary in thirty days after the day of sale, which was on the 21st September last. I ascertained that the money had been paid, and yet up to within three weeks—for I believe that covers the time the bill was under consideration—up to within three weeks the money had not reached the Treasury of the United States.

Now, I make no charge whatever of improper use of that money. I do not believe the Secretary of the Navy would misappropriate one dollar of it; but this I say, that if he kept that money in the hands of some subordinate agent in the city of New York or the city of Boston or some other place, $500,000 in money which ought to have been in the Treasury of the United States, he neglected his duty.

I found after very thorough inquiry that $50,000 had been received from the navy agent or purchasing agent or whatever he may be called in the city of New York on an open check, and the officer in charge of the bureau was unable to say on what account it came, except it came to the credit of the Navy Department, and there it was an open warrant waiting some explanation from somebody.

Mr. BELFORD. New York thieves seem to be running the money of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. All I say is I will not trust a public officer to spend money who retains public funds in his custody which by virtue of law should be in the Treasury. I do not know what use, if any, may have been made of it; but I know this, there is no obligation on him to pay it into the Treasury until after the next election, unless he does it under obligation of the law, which he has not respected so far as I could get any information at the Treasury Department.

I did not know this debate was coming up or I would have gone to the Treasury to see whether the money is there now. It may be there now for aught I know. If not, it is in somebody's custody, possibly drawing interest which does not inure to the benefit of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] was disagreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no watchman, shipkeeper, laborer, workman, or mechanic shall be permitted to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day for the Government of the United States except in cases of emergency, when they shall receive extra pay, per diem, at the rate of eight hours' work.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not offer to attach that to the pending paragraph, because the recommendation of the committee is to non-concur in the Senate amendment, and his amendment should be voted upon separately and be determined on its merits.

Mr. COX, of New York. I raise the question of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is bound to sustain the point of order if insisted upon.

The question is now upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to amend the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the next amendment of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 45:

For procuring tools and otherwise preparing for the construction of iron or steel ships, $150,000, the same to be expended in fitting for construction of the hulls of such ships such navy yard or yards as may be deemed most advantageous to prepare and use for such work.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of being heard for a few moments.

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend in the discussion of these amendments of the Senate to be drawn into anything like a general discussion either with reference to the policy of the Government toward building these ships or with reference to defending the party of the present administration against attacks. It is the easiest matter in the world for gentlemen to charge fraud generally. It has become a popular cry throughout the country, and it is very easy for any gentleman to get upon the floor here or upon the stump and raise this cry of fraud. But it is a very different question when it comes to the proof. I therefore do not intend at this time to attempt any defense of the Secretary of the Navy or of his administration of the Navy Department. At the proper time I shall take occasion to lay before this House some facts, and I will then challenge the House, the majority of the House, to the truth of the assertions which I shall then make.

But the gentleman from New York, Mr. HEWITT, always sensational, has already launched upon the House indirectly a charge against the Secretary of the Navy. It amounts to this, stripped of all verbiage, that he sold a certain number of condemned ships under the act of August 5, 1882, and received in money the amount of $384,753, which sum has not been paid into the Treasury up to this time. Now if there is anything in the charge or the insinuation, that is it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Up to a month ago, when I inquired, it had not been paid in.

Mr. CALKINS. Very well; but that is the statement of the gentleman, and I am only calling attention to what he said.

Mr. Chairman, I have already dispatched to the Secretary of the Navy to come to the House, and until he comes I can not give to the committee his explanation; but in advance of it I want to say that explanation, when it does come, I will vouch for that it will be sufficient and satisfactory to every member of this House.

A MEMBER. How do you know?

Mr. CALKINS. I have that much confidence in the Secretary of the Navy. I know him, and I answer for him.

Now a step further. This continual charge against public men, this continual besmirching of men in official positions, ought not in good conscience or in good faith to be tolerated or longer indulged in. Especially is that so, Mr. Chairman, when the charge is unsupported by evidence. It is easy to blast the reputation of any man in these times. Why, sir, Mr. Franklin a hundred years ago predicted the exact situation that we see to-day. He said there would come a time in this country, under the strong partisan prejudices and passions of the hour, with a press behind each party, that would continually blast the reputation of public men. I am loath to believe that the public men of to-day in either party in this country are any more corrupt than they were in any of the days of former administrations.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it should be the duty as well as the pride of all men of all parties, before launching charges of corruption and letting them roll from their mouths as sweet morsels, to hesitate and reflect on what they are about to do. They should be careful to guard the reputation of men in public life. And when a man is found unfaithful to his trust, then I believe it to be the duty of every man to rise up above party considerations and let no guilty man escape. I prefer, Mr. Chairman, rather than to make these charges against men in official positions—I prefer to believe in the honesty and integrity and the good faith of the men who are administering the affairs of our Government, no matter to what party they belong.

Now, one thing further with reference to the Secretary of the Navy. I confess to the House that as a Republican I did not have the regard for the Secretary of the Navy that some of my friends had. But a close contact with that gentleman and a careful search into the affairs of that Department, so far as I have been able to make it, has convinced me that of all the Secretaries we have ever had the present Secretary of the Navy is the ablest, and is, I would not say more honest than any of his predecessors, but at least as honest as any who has ever occupied that position in the history of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. CALKINS. So I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that a charge by so distinguished gentlemen as the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Missouri that they are unwilling to place at the discretion and disposal of the present Secretary money to build up a navy is too illiberal and narrow even for the Democratic party. Why, sir, you have got the power through your committees to scrutinize and search every single dollar and cent of expenditure. You have got more than that. You have got the power where any contract that is made by the Secretary is tainted with fraud to absolutely abrogate it. For fraud abrogrates all contracts. Your power is absolute. To stand in the presence of the people of the country, who are demanding a navy for the protection of their harbors and their commerce, and undertake to say as an excuse that you are unwilling to trust the Secretary of the Navy with the disposal of these funds is even too narrow, I say, for the Democratic party. I say that you are alienating, as you have done in the past, the great independent journals of the country from you; that you are alienating and will continue to alienate by this policy the great independent thought that controls this country. And if I were to desire to mark out party lines, nothing would suit me as a Republican better than to see you hew to such narrow limits as this. I think, I trust at least, that I can look beyond all party considerations to the glory and honor of my country.

Indeed, it was the tradition in the old times to have a navy, and a good one, for this country. It will not do for you gentlemen to say that in the past the Republican party is responsible for the condition of the Navy. You had the lower House of Congress ever since 1874. There were but a few years intervening after the close of the war until that time. At that time, as I had occasion to point out to you, naval architecture was undergoing an entire reconstruction. The money that was attempted to be spent then in building up a navy you say has been misapplied; and yet it was spent on the very vessels that had proved the great success of the national cause in the recent war. But because naval architecture was undergoing an entire reconstruction you stood here since 1874 palsied and paralyzed in the presence of a decayed and decaying navy and refused to build up and put upon the waters of the globe a navy consonant with the grandeur and magnificence of this country. The people will no longer hold you guiltless. The time has come when they demand action from you. As the Admiral of the Navy said the other day, when our ships entered the ports of a barbarous or a semi-barbarous people in order to enforce protection a gunboat must go first.

I say the people will hold you guiltless no longer. Looking to the magnificent cities that line the borders of our country, in view of the millions of treasure piled up in these cities, I say it is a standing invitation for the smallest powers of the globe to make an attack upon them. The gentleman represents the city of New York; I come from the interior of the country, where foreign ships can never touch one of my people. But for the honor and glory of my country I ask that you protect New York. I ask that you protect Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Charleston, and San Francisco.

A MEMBER. And Washington.

Mr. CALKINS. All the cities. They are ours. They belong to our country. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask my friend why the last Congress did not make all these appropriations, when both branches were Republican?

Mr. CALKINS. The moment we had it in our power to do so we undertook to launch these steel cruisers.

Mr. BRUMM. The amendment now before the committee proposes the preparation of the navy-yards for the building of such ships as we may deem necessary should be built. I am sorry that my friend on my right took the ground that he was opposed entirely to the building of ships in our navy-yards. I agree with him that we should by private enterprise build our ships to a certain extent, and perhaps near to the full extent; but not entirely. A policy should be adopted by this Government that keeps us prepared for war in times of peace, and yet should never permit this Government to place entirely in the hands of private men the building of vessels for an emergency. The Government should establish and keep its own yards, in which it may in time of emergency build its own ships, in addition to those that may be built by private enterprise.

It is proposed to us not to build any ships until we first find out the results of experiments in other countries. Why, when this experiment has been tried others will follow. Progress is the law which governs the era we are living in. One experiment will follow the other, and the argument of the gentlemen on the other side will be as good argument a hundred, nay, a thousand, years from now as it is to-day. Let us build with the advantages we have and the knowledge we have, and keep pace with foreign nations. Let us experiment ourselves, and not halt because, forsooth, it may cost a few dollars in money. Another objection is urged. Another gentleman on the other side of the House is afraid that the laboring men will be paid too much for too little work. I will not comment on that. I have only to say that I am not afraid of the laboring man getting one penny too much, nor am I here to stop the building of vessels because he may not have to work long enough.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRUMM. My time is too short to allow questions; otherwise I should be glad to yield. They all agree that our navy is in a desperate condition. We stand here, like boys, defying the thunderbolt with popguns, with nothing at all afloat to defend ourselves against the great navies of the Old World.

What else? We know that we ought to have a navy, but gentlemen say they will not allow this administration to build it. They raise the old cry of "fraud." Why, gentlemen, you represent a party which has been dead as a national party for twenty-four years, and the reason of your death-warrant was that at that time you stole the entire armament of our Government, robbed us of all our cannon and of everything which the last Democratic administration could lay their hands upon. You sent our vessels of the Navy adrift into places where they would become the prey of the enemies of the land. You represent a party that robbed us of Army, Navy, and all that you could lay hands on. And now your only excuse for refusing to appropriate money to build a navy is that the party controlling the Government may, as you did, commit fraud.

Mr. SPRINGER. We never stole the Presidency.

Mr. BRUMM. You tried to, and because you could not get it you endeavored to break up the Government.

Mr. WOLFORD. While I expect to vote against concurring in the amendments of the Senate, every one of them, for reasons which I shall give if I have time, I wish to state first what I am in favor of in reference to a navy.

Our Navy is insufficient, and your party, gentlemen on the other side, is responsible for it. You destroyed and sold the navy we had, one of the best navies in the world, and did not sell it for enough to pay the cost of selling. And you have always stood in the way of a good navy.

I want such a navy as will protect our commerce on every sea. I want an appropriation sufficient to build fortifications around every city on the seacoast, and I do not care what that may cost. But before I want that done I want a reduction in the tariff which will enable us to get iron cheap enough to build vessels in which to carry our commerce. I want the commerce of America to be carried on American bottoms and under the American flag. To-day you have no flag worth speaking of on the high seas, and you are responsible for it.

You have no protection for our commerce and you have no commerce in American vessels to protect. I want a commerce, and I want a navy sufficient to protect that commerce, and I want fortifications upon the seacoast that will enable us to defy every nation and all the nations upon the earth.

But I want no such navy as you are talking about building now. I want a navy that will go upon the high seas ready and prepared to meet the nations of the earth. The ships that you are talking about now can be sunk by two shots from any navy in the world now in existence. [Laughter.]

You are not talking about doing what the great interests of this great people demand or what is demanded by the honor of this country. Come up like patriots and help us to build a navy that is worthy of the name of a navy, worthy of the United States, and to build up a commerce that would be worthy of that navy and of our nation.

Mr. BRUMM. Why do you not do it? You have the majority.

Mr. WOLFORD. You say that I belong to a dead party, to a party that has been dead for twenty years. I tell you that I hear in the distance even now the sound of the trumpet of a resurrection which will bring that party into power. [Great laughter.] And when that party comes into power, with an honest Democratic party in power, with a President Democratic, with Congress Democratic, with the Departments Democratic——

Mr. BRUMM. But the trouble is that you have not any honest Democratic party at all.

Mr. WOLFORD. Oh, you are so honest that you hate to hear anything said about honesty. I know you and your party. [Renewed laughter.] I want a party which, when it shall come into power, will not undertake to use the labor of the country to buy votes with as you have done. Do you deny that?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KING. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman.

Mr. WOLFORD. I say I want to see the Democratic party come into power. It has been out of power long enough to have all the corruption of the party rot away from it. [Laughter.] It has been out of power so long that it will come in a pure party, determined to build up a pure Government, and to do all that is necessary for the honor and glory and dignity of the country. I want to see that party build up a navy. I want to see it build fortifications; and do not be afraid, I will see it. I want to see it do these great works for the nation's honor and the nation's glory.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The trump of the resurrection may bring them in; that is all that will do it.

Mr. WOLFORD. But you will have no part in the first resurrection. [Great laughter.] You will not be among the blessed and the holy who will take part in the first resurrection. There will be several resurrections roll along before you will come in; you need have no fears about that. [Great laughter.]

When some of you charge the Democratic party with being opposed to a navy you charge what you know to be false. [Laughter.] The whole Democratic party is in favor of a navy, of a grand navy; but they are not in favor of your popgun navy, of such a navy as you propose to build.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Semmes is in favor of a navy.

Mr. WOLFORD. He is, is he?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Yes. Why are not you in favor of a navy?

Mr. WOLFORD. I am.

Mr. PETTIBONE. No, you are not.

Mr. WOLFORD. We will have a navy that will be worthy of the nation after you gentlemen have been killed off, which you will be directly after the next Presidential election. [Laughter.] Mind if you are not.

Mr. MILLIKEN. As my friend from Kentucky is a genial gentleman, I would like to ask him another question—whether this bill creating this "popgun navy" has not come from a Democratic committee?

Mr. WOLFORD. Great mercy, no! [Laughter.] It came from a Republican committee in the Senate. Why, sir, can you not see Republicanism in it? Anybody can see that. I do not care who advocates this proposition, you have got this thing so abominably fixed, your party has grown so corrupt—you do not deny it, you can not deny it [laughter]—your party has grown so corrupt that there is no doing anything with you. [Laughter.]

I was going to say the time will soon come when these things will all be set right; and then I am for having the best navy in the world. I do not believe in the idea of having America second to anybody. I want the best fortifications in the world upon our seacoast. I want our country to have the best commerce in the world on our own vessels; and I want them built by American labor. That is the way to protect American labor—put out this work to private contract, and allow American laborers to be paid for fair work. I want to protect American labor. I want also to protect American honor. My distinguished friend from Indiana, when he talked about the honor and glory of our country, appealed to my heart; and I thought, "Oh, if you could only see clean Democrats come into power, how the honor and glory of the country would be advanced!" Then the country will prosper as it did of old. When that time comes we shall not see corruption practiced by spending money to keep men in power. We shall not see any of those vile abuses which are a disgrace to any political party and a disgrace to the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I shall never live to see that day.

Mr. RANDALL. Unless there can be an understanding in regard to the termination of debate, I shall move that the committee rise with the view to limiting debate on this proposition to ten minutes. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], both members of the Committee on Appropriations, desire to be heard.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will say fifteen minutes. I may wish to occupy a little more than five minutes, probably not.

Mr. HISCOCK. Say ten minutes on each side.

Mr. RANDALL. I am pressed on all sides to have this bill disposed of speedily; but I assent to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that further debate be limited to fifteen minutes—one-half that time on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the limitation of time proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to control one-half the time and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] the other half.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take part in this debate and should not have done so but for the intimation made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in his peculiar method—protesting when he made the intimation that he had confidence in the honor and honesty of the Secretary of the Navy, at the same time, while looking him in the face and saying "Hail! good fellow," striking him under the fifth rib.

The gentleman from New York intimated that the Secretary of the Navy had sold these condemned vessels, and in doing so had not complied with the law by covering the proceeds into the Treasury, stating further that in his zeal to see whether the law had been complied with he had gone to the Treasury Department and found out the facts. Behold what a plain tale will put down that charge.

The law requires the head of each Department to make a report to Congress at the commencement of each annual session. I hold in my hand the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which has been printed for four months and more, which was placed before Congress on the first Monday of last December. The gentleman from New York as well as every other member of the House has had opportunity to consult it. If he will turn to page 19 of the main report he will find that the Secretary of the Navy there tells about the sale of these vessels; and then if he will turn to the exhibits on pages 162 to 167 he will find a statement of every vessel that was sold, of the advertisement that was made, of the appraisement, and of the amount that each ship brought. He will find further an extract from the law of March 3, 1883, which provides that from the proceeds of the sales made by virtue of the act certain expenses shall be paid connected with the sale and the cost of removing the unsalable vessels, all of which had not been paid at the time of making this report and I presume has not been yet paid, and while all the money is deposited with the Treasurer of the United States it should not be finally covered into the Treasury until these expenses are paid. I will insert a part of these documents at length at the close of my remarks, sufficient to show that the charge of the gentleman from New York is wholly without foundation.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me so I may have a telegram read from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. I send up to be read the following telegram.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., April 24, 1884.

To Hon. W. H. CALKINS:

The proceeds of sales of old vessels, amounting to $384,753, as appears by my report, page 19, were immediately deposited in the Treasury of the United States and have there remained, except that drafts have been for advertising and expenses of sale.

W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. I want now a minute in conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I had no knowledge of that telegram until it was read here, but it does nothing more or less than in substance cover the statements in the public reports, to be seen of all men, published last December.

I thank God, Mr. Chairman, that I am not so organized that I am compelled at all times, in season and out of season, to distrust every public officer or every private citizen.

I thank God, again, I do not belong to a party which is placed in such a strait its leader or leaders are compelled in teeth of the facts to insinuate false charges against the honesty and honor of public officials. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I will now read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, pages 162 and 163, the memorandum concerning the sale of these vessels:

Memorandum concerning the sale, under the fifth section of the deficiency act, approved March 3, 1883, of vessels stricken from the Navy Register.

In accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress, approved August 5, 1882, making appropriations for the naval service, boards were appointed to examine all the vessels of the Navy and to report which of them were unfit for further service, or if the same were unfinished in any navy-yard, to report which could not be finished without great and disproportionate expense; and if the Secretary of the Navy concurred in opinion with the boards, he was directed to strike the names of such condemned vessels from the Navy Register and report the fact to Congress. These boards made their examinations, and upon their reports, concurred in by the Secretary, the following-named vessels have been stricken from the Navy Register: Congress, Guard, Kansas, Plymouth, Emerald, Massachusetts, Sabine, Connecticut, Iowa, Niagara, Oregon, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Florida, Blue Light, New Orleans, Colossus, Java, Susquehanna, Glance, Burlington, Supply, Sorrel, Antietam, Dictator, Frolic, Relief, Pawnee, Rose, Benicia, old Monadnock, Narragansett, Nyack, Saco, Tuscarora, Alaska, Worcester, Canandaigua, Jean Sands, Shawmut, Savannah, Santee, Phlox, Wyoming, Roanoke, Cyane.

The fifth section of the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies, approved March 3, 1883, authorized the Secretary of the Navy to invite proposals for the purchase of such of these vessels as it was deemed to the interest of the United States to sell. Under this authority proposals were invited by advertisement June 21, 1883, for the purchase of the following-named condemned vessels, and the bids were publily opened at the Navy Department September 20:

Congress, Guard, Kansas, and Sabine, at Portsmouth, N. H.
Iowa, Niagara, and Ohio, at Boston, Mass.
Blue Light and Florida, at New London, Conn.
New Orleans, at Sacket's Harbor, N. Y.
Susquehanna, at New York, N. Y.
Burlington, Glance, Sorrel, and Dictator, at League Island, Pa.
Frolic and Relief, at Washington, D. C.
Worcester, Shawmut, and Savannah, at Norfolk, Va.
Roanoke, at Chester, Pa.
Pawnee and Seaweed, at Port Royal, S. C.

All of these were sold to the highest bidders, with the exception of the Florida and Pawnee, for which there were no bids.

The highest bid for the Niagara, $29,000, was accepted; but as there was an apparent misunderstanding as to her condition at the time of sale, the matter is still open.

The total appraisement of these vessels was $271,300. The amount for which they sold was $308,273, an advance of $36,973.

As the condemned vessels at the Mare Island navy-yard had not been appraised, and proposals could not be invited for their purchase in June, 1883, when the others were offered, they were advertised August 13, the bids to be opened November 20. They were the Alaska, Benicia, Narragansett, Nyack, Saco, Tuscarora, and old Monadnock.

All of these were sold with the exception of the Benicia, for which no proposals were received. They were appraised at $58,800, and were sold for $76,480, an advance of $17,680 over the appraisement.

The total appraisement of all the vessels sold under the statute was $330,100, and the amount for which sold $384,753, an advance of $54,653 over the appraisement.

No vessel was sold at less than the appraised value. The money received has been placed on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, subject to check by the Secretary of the Navy, as the expenses connected with the sale and the cost of removing the unsalable are to be paid from the proceeds of the sale.

The cost of advertising, from bills paid thus far, amounts to $4,363.98. There are still some outstanding bills on that account.

The act of March 3, 1883, above mentioned, further provided for readvertising vessels in case they were not sold when first offered, and that the cost of advertising such should be paid from any forfeiture under the terms of the original sale. It still further provided that in the event of any condemned vessel under construction in the yards, unworthy of being completed, that could not be properly sold, and it became necessary to remove the same, the cost of such removal should be paid out of the net proceeds derived from the sale of other vessels. It was thought to the interests of the service to remove the following of that class: Massachusetts, Connecticut, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Colossus, Java, and Canandaigua. Some of these vessels are now being broken up, and a similar disposition will be made of the others.

The Wyoming, Antietam, Supply, Emerald, Santee, Phlox, and Jean Sands, although stricken from the Navy Register, have been retained for purposes at the yards and stations for which they can be made useful. No disposition has been made of the Plymouth and Rose.

There has been no readvertisement of the vessels offered but not sold.

Copies of the advertisements and a list of the proposals received are herewith transmitted.

JNO. W. HOGG, Chief Clerk.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, November 30, 1883.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I will reserve that.

Mr. HOLMAN took the floor.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask the gentleman to yield to me one minute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from New York for that time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that seeing it stated in the report of the Secretary as quoted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the vessels and old stores had been sold and the amount of the money received, I went personally to the Treasury and asked if it had been covered in. I was taken by the clerks from bureau to bureau and was told that not one dollar had been covered into the Treasury, but that a draft for $50,000 had been received from some officer in New York, the purport of which the Treasury had no knowledge. That is the exact statement I made before and which I repeat now. And it will appear by what the gentleman says that the money, if it is in the Treasury, and they told me it was not——

Several MEMBERS. Who told you?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The head of the bureau.

Several MEMBERS. What bureau?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. His name I do not know. I first went to the Register of the Treasury, Mr. Bruce, and he informed me that so far as he knew nothing had been received. He sent a clerk, who went from bureau to bureau with me until finally we came to this bureau to which the remittance came, and I was told $50,000 only had been received, but whether on that account or not no one knew.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me put an inquiry to the gentleman.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why did you not go to Mr. Chandler?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I did not.

Mr. HEPBURN. But why did you not?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will answer, if time be given to me. I was taken ill, and did not return to the House for a week.

Mr. KASSON. The Secretary of the Navy says it was deposited with the Treasurer in a certain place.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. What treasury? I know of none but the Treasury of the United States, and it was not there so far as I could discover. I was told by Mr. Bruce, the Register of the Treasury, that he had no record of money so deposited, and it is his duty to keep the record of the receipts into the Treasury.

And now, when the investigation is made, gentlemen will find that although the money may be in the custody of the Treasurer of the United States, it is not covered into the Treasury in the manner the law requires, but it is still subject to the control of the Secretary, and that is the gravamen of my statement.

Mr. KASSON. Why did you not go to the Treasurer?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I did, but he was not in. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRUMM. May I ask in what capacity the gentleman sought that information—from what committee?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the display of feeling to which this amendment to increase the naval appropriations has given rise is not indicative of any public anxiety. On the contrary, it is periodical. It is what may be called a spasm in legislation. It is witnessed on this floor at almost regular intervals and has been ever since the oldest member of the House came here, but in much greater intensity in the more recent years. This paroxysm of fear for the national safety is quite appalling; yet in the midst of this wild anxiety, this feverish expression of the abject fear of gentlemen for the safety of our shores, the people of this country whose homes are in such fearful peril have been and are in a state of calm repose. [Applause and laughter.]

Looking at the real facts of the case and into the cause of this wild demand for a great navy, we may well ask, whose voice is it that comes up here tremulous with anxiety and solicitation for the public safety? Is it the voice of the people? If so, in what form does it come? In what manner have you heard it expressed? No, sir; it does not come from the people; they utter no cry of alarm and no demand for the expensive show of naval power; but from the ingenious and patriotic men who are to be interested and enriched in the expenditure of the millions of money covered by these amendments. In tones of pathetic pleading and in the fervor of patriotic impulse they plead for the national safety and would torture even the traditions of our fathers for argument for a great navy.

But, I ask gentlemen, from what period does that tradition come? Is it from seventy years ago when our fathers improvised a navy that held the seas against the power of the British navy? Your traditions are against a great navy, and against it for the same reason that they are against a great army; both are and always have been equally enemies of free government. To this voice is joined that of the great capitalists, grown timid over excessive wealth. These are the two appealing voices heard in this House, and honorable gentlemen deceived by the fervor of the appeal mistake them for the public voice and repeat them in words of burning eloquence on this floor. Yes, sir, the men who are to reap the profits out of the millions you are urged with such vehemence to expend from the public Treasury under the guise of a patriotic purpose, and the other the timidity of your overgrown capitalists who have lost faith in the people and free government—estates out of harmony, by their exceptional magnitude, with free institutions, and which you have rendered possible by class legislation and favoritism in legislation; these are the two forces which find utterance on this floor in this patriotic appeal!

The people demanding a great navy! Why, gentlemen can with equal truth say that they are demanding a great army, for the purpose of the one is exactly the same as the other. What nation, from Russia and Great Britain to Spain and Portugal, has a great navy that has not an army in proportion; and what nation uses its great naval and military power except to overawe its own people and hold at defiance neighboring states? Yes, sir, in all ages the great navy and the great army have been employed for the same purpose. What nation, sir, that oppresses its people by a splendid navy does not employ that navy in subjugating and overawing its own people at home, its colonies abroad, and encroaching on rights and territories of less favored states? None can be named, either in the past or present. No, sir, our fathers did not imitate the wretched vanity and ambition of kings in seeking to display a formidable navy as an emblem of power of the rising Republic, but a small and unpretending navy, adapted to the incidental wants of government in its relation to the world at large was all that our fathers deemed necessary even in the infancy of our Republic. Our greatness as a people was not achieved under the shelter of either a great army or navy, but through the grander pursuits of peace.

Talk of commerce being sheltered and protected by the Navy! Has your commerce been disturbed even for a moment by an external force for the last seventy years? Is the vast commerce of Great Britain, Germany, and France with us protected upon the high seas or on our shores or in our ports by the navies of those nations? Do armed ships convoy the merchant vessels? Is our great line of commerce on the coasts of the Mediterranean or anywhere else protected by our Navy? What an absurdity! Why, sir, your commerce, vast as it is, is carried by the common carriers of the world, the ships of all nations. Thirty-one of thirty-seven vessels in our Navy in commission seaworthy and respectable ships, respectable for the purposes for which they are needed and used; grand symbols of a people great by the arts of peace! We have but three in the Mediterranean. All of the others are scattered over the globe as the convenience for visiting in a friendly way, generally without purpose or design, the ports of the maritime nations may suggest. An occasional trip for observation in a general way, sometimes to aid a consul in a half-civilized nation, or to give a nation a friendly salute, or bear some memento to some ambitious prince in the growing states of the remote East, is about the circle of employment, and has been in the main throughout our history except in four great emergencies in one hundred years, when improvised navies brought us immortal glory. The Navy is not protecting your commerce.

Your commerce is in no peril; it neither asks nor needs protection. Your Navy never has been engaged in protecting commerce since piracy by the common act of the nations was made a crime against the human race. You hold the world at bay by your peaceful commerce and by the majesty that dwells in a great and prosperous people too conscious of their power to employ it in the cause of injustice or oppression. Your carrying trade is done alike by your own ships and by ships of all the nations. I admit you are not to a large extent the common carriers of commerce, but your commerce is none the less for that, and so cosmopolitan is this commercial intercourse that many of your merchants sail vessels under the flags of other nations.

Mr. Chairman, I protest against this appeal to this unmanly and un-American timidity, this pretense of public danger from abroad as an expression of American sentiment. Your Navy now, with the monitors and cruisers you are building and have no excuse for completing, is immensely greater than this Government has ever before had in a time of profound peace. The American people are not timid; they are not fearful that their great name among nations will lose its power for peace by any act of folly or injustice of its rules. With no relations except those of commerce with any, dealing justly, as our fathers have done, with all nations; with vast oceans separating us from any aggressive, and greater in resources than any other nation, why should we imitate the old monarchies on the unmanly plea of public danger? No, sir; the plea is not genuine. The great navy and the great army that in due course will follow it if the people do not rebuke the beginning are not to protect your commerce but to overawe your own people. Look at the immense navy of Great Britain. Is it employed in protecting commerce? No; but in upholding her power and overawing her colonies. No, sir, the moral power of 55,000,000 of people such as this nation can boast of with no plans of conquest or ambition needs neither standing armies nor great navies to command the respect and forbearance of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. I now resume the floor, and desire to say in conclusion that the gentleman from New York went for malfeasance in a public officer and succeeded only in showing his own ill-will, and I am sorry to say, for I can not often say it of him, his ignorance of the published reports of the Department——

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate has expired. The question is now on the motion of the Committee on Appropriations to non-concur in the amendment which has been read.

The motion to non-concur was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "dollars," in line 505 of the printed bill, the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask leave now to offer the amendment, of which I gave notice some time ago, to amend the amendment of the Senate by adding what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no watchman, shipkeeper, laborer, workman, or mechanic shall be permitted to work more than eight hours in any calendar day for the Government except in cases of emergency, when they shall receive extra pay for service at the rate of eight hours work per diem.

Mr. COX, of New York. I raise the point of order that that is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to know on what ground the gentleman from New York bases the point of order. But I would prefer that he should withdraw it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will withhold the point of order to allow the gentleman to speak in support of his amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to prevent the application of the money that may be appropriated by this bill to purposes of fraud which can be perpetrated to the extent of one or two million dollars under what some might call the color of law if the Senate amendments shall prevail. I am a good friend to the Navy and I am a good friend to the laboring man, but I am opposed to an aristocracy of labor. I am opposed to permitting the laborers who are employed on behalf of the Government to get 25 per cent. more money for the same sort of work that is done by laborers in private establishments in the vicinity of where the public work is done.

As I said a while ago, the Secretary of the Navy about a year since revived the eight-hour law, claiming that it was in force, after all the Secretaries of all the Departments for six years, from 1877 down to 1883, had held that they were obliged to pay only the same wages in winter or summer as are paid by private employers for labor of the same kind in the vicinity. Not only has the Secretary of the Navy revived the eight-hour law in spite of the statute of 1862 and the decision of the Supreme Court of 1877, but the Secretary of War has done it also. He did it in January last. And the eight-hour law is to come on the stage and answer the purposes in this Presidential election that the star-route frauds did four years ago, unless my amendment or something like it be adopted.

The Secretary of War will control all the river-and-harbor fund if a river-and-harbor bill be passed. He employs a large number of laborers in the Ordnance Department, and upon the fortifications. The Secretary of the Treasury will also likely expend five or six millions on public buildings this year, so that thousands and tens of thousands of laborers will be employed in connection with the War and Navy and Treasury Departments between now and the Presidential election. And those laborers, no matter of what grade, whether common laborers or experts, can get 25 per cent. more wages from the Government than they could get from private employers for the same amount and kind of work. And will not that make every laborer employed by the Government or by an officer of the Government dependent on the favoritism, political influence, or partiality of the officer or the Secretary that employs him? Will it not make him dependent and control his vote? Will he not be disposed to submit to assessments for political purposes if necessary, in order to be retained as a laborer in the public service?

Sir, I protest that the country is not aware of the meaning of the revival of the eight-hour law by a mere order of the heads of those two Departments. It has a purpose; and that purpose, if this bill passes as amended by the Senate, is to use the fund appropriated to employ laborers, perhaps at the Boston navy-yard, or the Brooklyn navy-yard, or the Mare Island navy-yard, or wherever it will do most good to carry out the political projects of their employers next November. There ought to be some restraint placed upon the usurped discretion of Secretaries of Departments to prevent them from using the taxes paid by millions of private laborers to either pamper or corruptly control the votes of the few laborers on public works.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from South Carolina anticipates discussion on the eight-hour law. He does it on this naval appropriation bill. Is it relevant here and now? How can one fathom the logical and legislative connection between the two subjects?

The gentleman charges fraud in the execution of this law. Where is the fraud if not in its non-execution? If there be any fault or fraud is it not because the law is not executed; or, if executed, not uniformly throughout the United States?

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman deny that all the Departments have acquiesced in the Supreme Court decision for six years and that these Secretaries have disregarded that decision?

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman has had his fifteen minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish the gentleman from New York to answer that question. Have not all the Departments acquiesced in the Supreme Court decision for six years?

Mr. COX, of New York. I answer questions only when put to me suaviter in modo. If not, I desire to assume the fortiter in re.

Mr. TILLMAN. Can not the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. COX, of New York. When the gentleman from South Carolina charges fraud in this matter he makes an attack on the laboring men of this country. They demand its execution. They reprobate its dilatory or exceptional or partial execution. The Departments have not executed this law uniformly. It is one thing on the California coast, another on the Mississippi or Atlantic. The employés at some places are compelled to work nine and ten hours per day; at other places eight hours. At the Rock Island (Ill.) arsenal they work nine or ten hours, while at the arsenal at Frankford, Philadelphia, the eight-hour law has prevailed since an order of Secretary Lincoln of January 3, 1884.

Mr. NEECE. Within the last ten days the employés at Rock Island have been placed on eight hours.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am glad to know that the Secretary of War recognizes the cogency of the law. It was not to be expected that that excellent administrative officer—who bears an honored name for his father as well as himself—should have been very forward in doing that which other Cabinet officers had so long disregarded. Upon petitions of employés he issued his orders and they were carried out as follows, namely: Arsenal at Benicia, Cal., January 3, 1884; arsenal at Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa., January 9, 1884; national armory, Springfield, Mass., March 1, 1884; arsenal, Watervliet, N. Y., March 1, 1884; arsenal, Rock Island, Ill., April 3, 1884.

So much for the War Department. How is it with the United States Treasury Department? I have a letter here from those interested that some 200 laborers in the public stores of New York city work from one to three hours extra per day without extra compensation.

It was only the other day the Secretary of War, at my instance, reduced the hours of labor at the practicing-ground for ordnance at Sandy Hook to eight hours. There was no fraud, but great justice, in making this uniformity. In other cases laborers have to work for the Government over the eight hours a day and get nothing extra for the time beyond the requirements of the law.

The gentleman from South Carolina seems to have this as a special trouble on his mind. He is unhappy because some of the Departments are endeavoring to execute this law. Again, I ask him where is the fraud? I can see none unless it be in Congress, which holds out its promise to the ear of honest laborers and breaks it to their hope. Or it is the administration of the law in failing to compel its functionaries to carry out the law as it now exists.

The laboring men of this country are in earnest about their protest on this subject. We made the law, and have winked at its breach. Proclamation has been made for its execution by Presidents and Secretaries, and we have not upheld the example or compelled its general observance.

These breaches of the law and this neglect to execute its provisions have called out signal sympathetic remonstrances from the workingmen of our country. Gentlemen talk loosely who sneer at this demand. Labor has not asked much from Government to ameliorate its harsh conditions. Its lawful demands should be regarded cheerfully and promptly by those who are so ready to anathematize their illegal demands. It is for us to set the example of law-abiding before we shoot down artisans or call forth the State militia or Federal arms to enforce obedience to the law.

In recent assemblages of laboring folk there has been no uncertain sound on this topic. Thousands have openly clamored and they are yet clamoring for the general and unexceptional execution of this law. It must be executed. I speak no new thoughts on a new theme. I speak consciously for the eight or ten millions of laboring men who are watching this matter. I speak for those who are connected as employés with the Government as well as for those outside who hope by the example of the Government that their own lives will be cheered and bettered by the lessening of their hours of toil.

It was said here once in debate by Senator HOAR, then a member of this House, that the experiment was tried in the Springfield arsenal, both as to eight hours and ten hours. With what result? This: That men would do more work the year round for the Government in eight hours than when they were required to work ten.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then why do you pay for the additional two hours 25 per cent. more?

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the gentleman should confine his remarks to the point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I bow to the call of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall hereafter insist that the debate be confined to the point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I was about to conclude these remarks, which are not upon the point of order. They were in response to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I will say, finally, that whether it be physical labor, or mental labor, or moral labor, or religious labor, more can be accomplished in well-doing in eight hours, with the additional respite and recreation thus afforded, than can be done in ten hours. I believe that there is a higher law, mental, moral, and divine, which solves this industrial problem. If the gentleman from South Carolina would study that law heedfully he would find the beauty of its provisions in the benignity of its operation and the improvement of our toilers. Ay, even in his own case he would find out that if he would rest more he would be stronger. [Laughter.] "Whoso wanteth rest will also want of might!"

Mr. TILLMAN. I would ask the gentleman if he is in favor of paying Government laborers more than laborers in private establishments?

Mr. COX, of New York. I am for executing the law. It is on the statute-book, and you can not get rid of it except by repealing it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Departments have got rid of it for six years.

Mr. COX, of New York. Who is to blame for that? They; not those intended to be beneficiaries of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made against the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; the Chair sustains it, and holds that the amendment is not in order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that the committee rise and report its action to the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Before that is done I desire to state that there were some words omitted from the dispatch from the Secretary of the Navy which I had read when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was addressing the committee. With those words added, the dispatch will read as follows:

The proceeds of the sales of old vessels, amounting to $384,753, as appears by my report, page 19, were immediately deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and have there remained, except that drafts have been * * * for advertising and expenses of sale, and expenses of taking to pieces two old vessels on the stocks, as allowed by law.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and the Senate amendments thereto, and had directed him to report a recommendation that all the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in except amendment numbered 41, and that that amendment be concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, his Secretary; who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 3956) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the district of Gloucester;

An act (H. R. 4993) making it a felony for a person to falsely and fradulently assume or pretend to be an officer or employé acting under authority of the United States, or any Department or any officer thereof, and prescribing a penalty therefor; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 193) to provide for printing certain documents relating to customs revenues and domestic exports for the use of Congress.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend non-concurrence in all of the amendments of the Senate to the naval appropriation bill except amendment numbered 41, and as to that amendment the committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL. In order to facilitate business and save time I will move that the report of the Committee of the Whole be accepted so far as it relates to all the amendments of the Senate, except amendment numbered 41, and on concurring in that amendment I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first taken upon adopting so much of the report of the Committee of the Whole as recommends non-concurrence in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and that portion of the report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon concurring in the Senate amendment numbered 41.

Mr. BEACH. Let that amendment be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Insert the following:

"(41) To complete the ordnance outfit of the three new steel cruisers and one dispatch-boat, $500,000."

Mr. RANDALL. On that I demand the yeas and nays. I will inquire of the Chair whether a negative vote on the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole to concur in a Senate amendment is not equivalent to a non-concurrence on the part of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is always so held.

Mr. CALKINS. How is that?

The SPEAKER. If the House shall refuse to adopt the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole to concur in the amendment of the Senate just read it will be equivalent to a non-concurrence. On that question the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 127, nays 106, not voting 89; as follows:

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HEMPHILL] has been called home on account of sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the amendments of the Senate to the Post-Office appropriation bill.

AMERICAN COLLEGE AT ROME.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] the Chair will lay before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st instant, a report of the Secretary of State, with the accompanying papers, in relation to the threatened confiscation of the American College at Rome by the Italian Government.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1884.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FEES OF WITNESSES, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, asking an appropriation to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the current fiscal year for fees of witnesses and jurors in United States courts; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DEFICIENCY IN DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, asking an additional appropriation for miscellaneous items, stationery, horses, and wagons for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 6538) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LONG for ten days, beginning April 25.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River ask permission to sit during the sessions of the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. SLOCUM, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens from the American merchant marine was ordered to be reprinted.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. RYAN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to let these amendments remain as they are until the return of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR]. There can be no conference until that gentleman returns.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. When the gentleman from Michigan was here in the committee-room on last Monday it was understood and agreed by the committee we should ask for non-concurrence in all the Senate amendments and the bill should be sent to a committee of conference, when no further action would be taken until the return of the gentleman from Michigan. I am only carrying out the understanding and agreement I had on that occasion.

As the point was made yesterday by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], who is not a member of the committee, that the amendments must have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I am now only moving to go into committee for their consideration, so they may be reported back to the House and sent to a committee of conference, where they will remain until the return of the gentleman from Michigan, who was on the subcommittee with me. I trust the House will let the amendments take that course. If the gentleman from Iowa should withdraw his point of order it would expedite matters.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say I simply made the point to save the rights of the gentlemen whom I did not see here, and who as members of the Post-Office Committee were interested in this matter as profoundly and as wisely as the members of the Committee on Appropriations can be. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] is present now and I suppose there are others, and I wish to say I will object to nothing those gentlemen may wish.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish only to carry out the agreement.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state there can be no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, with the simple declaration from this side of the House it shall not be taken as strengthening in conference the position on the other side or weakening that on this.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. That matter being settled, I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS] will preside as Speaker pro tempore during the evening session.

And then, on motion of Mr. RANDALL (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., was called to order by Mr. ADAMS, of New York, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The business before the House is limited by order to debate only on revenue bills.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COSGROVE in the chair.

THE TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for debate only upon the tariff bill.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I began to address the House, but gave way to a motion to adjourn, as was then fitting, with the understanding that I should reoccupy the floor when the House again went into Committee of the Whole. And to-night I have only to say in brief that I believe while speech is silver silence is gold, and I know this great country is not anxious to hear any one talk at length upon the subject of the tariff and the bill before the House. Still, sir, a few words from myself may not be inopportune, representing as I do a district and a State which is entirely mediterranean. I chose that word deliberately. We speak of the great sea that washes the south of Europe as the Mediterranean—the sea that is in the midst of the land—and so of the interior States of America that have no ocean bordering them; they are mediterranean.

One of them happens to be the great State of Tennessee, midway between the North and the South and the East and West. It has 11,000 square miles of coal lands. Its mountains are ribbed with iron ore; its waters are perennial; they neither dry up nor freeze up. It has about the same number of square miles of cotton lands. It is a land of varied agriculture, with all the productions which go to the gladdening of the farmer's heart, and to the material, the raw material, which is used in the bettering of man's estate. But, sir, in the past it has been known as an agricultural State. The people have exerted their energies in the production of those things which went to feed the world and to furnish the raw material to clothe the world. I stated on yesterday what it seems to me is a truism, that behind every honest dollar's worth of property in this great world of ours is just one honest dollar's worth of hard work.

It seems to me that this proposition embraces the bottom truth in all systems of political economy. "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread," was the declaration that covered all of the children that ever sprang from our common forefather. Now, in this country and in this great Republic of America to-day we have what? We have an immense territory stretching out between the oceans, a land, a power, whose seat is in the midst of the nations, whose dominions are around her feet, and whose rulers are lords of the east and of the west. Every fact and every indication point to this consummation, that in this Republic the great work of the regeneration of humanity is to be wrought out. But we have got to do it by plain and honest square hard work. No miracle is to be wrought here. But to-day and now we shape the future in the wise policies or unwise, as we will, which shall determine the course of the future in our country.

One of the functions of this Congress is to raise revenue to carry on the Government; and that we have got to do. We have two ways to do it, by a tariff or tax upon the foreign commodities coming into our markets, on the one hand, or by a direct tax upon the energies of the people or upon the fruits of their labor upon the other. Free trade with the world means the taxation of our own people by direct legislation.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, and I know that the latter course has some advantages; and I understand, on the other hand, that there is not a political organization in this country that has ever presumed to take that stand. That would be free trade, allowing all commodities to come into our country without taxation, and wipe out anything and everything in the shape of customs exactions or custom-houses, and then we will have free trade and the benefits of free trade, if there are any. No one proposes that. Will any one seriously propose it to-day, and now, and here? We will relegate that by the common consent of all men at least to the twentieth century and to the time of the general disarmament of nations and the coming in of the political millennium.

Now we have to raise between three and four hundred millions of dollars every year to carry on this Government. I do not question, Mr. Chairman, that the bill now pending before this House would raise that revenue. I do not doubt it. On the other hand, I believe that the bill reported by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee would more than furnish a sufficient amount of revenue, coupled as it is with no pretense that we should abolish the internal revenue now being raised upon a few articles to the amount of one hundred and fifteen or one hundred and twenty millions of dollars each year.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose, after the clear, exhaustive analysis of the bill now pending before the committee which was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] in his speech upon this subject—I do not propose to discuss the bill further than to say that by lowering the duty on foreign goods the result would be a larger importation of foreign goods; and with a larger importation it is clear that if it rose to more than 20 per cent. of the present importation more revenue would be derived from it than from the present law as it stands upon our statute-book. Whatever we buy we have to pay for.

Now, whether it is wisest to purchase more goods from Europe than we now do, or stimulate the production of those very goods within our own country, is the question for us to determine. I say, behind every honest dollar's worth of property in America there is an honest dollar's worth of labor. That system is best for our country and for every country which shall set the most men at work and give to labor its widest, broadest, and best employment. And I am in favor of the protective system not so much because it gives us revenue, for I grant we can get that under a free-trade tariff, under a tariff for revenue only, but we shall have idle men in our streets and hunger at the board of the man who desires day by day to sell his labor.

Sir, near my own town, near my own home, we have a wide and a flowing river, and across it is built a mill-dam. There is water-power enough there to turn a million spindles, and yet it turns only one poor water-wheel, that grinds the corn and the wheat of the neighboring farmers. And seeing the water go over the dam, I recognize that that is love's labor lost. It is wasted power gone forever. So it is with the laboring men of our country. If they can not sell their labor between sunrise and sundown they never can sell it. It is wasted and it is gone.

We export to Europe and to foreign countries each year something like $800,000,000 worth of products in value. We import something in the neighborhood of seven hundred millions. The result is there is a balance of trade in our favor of about $100,000,000 each year. At present times are easy; the country is prosperous; but it is prosperous because we have 15,000,000 of our people engaged in the manufactories, that give us the result of the mechanic's handiwork on the one hand and make largely a market better for us than all our foreign markets on the other hand. As the years shall go on we shall take no backward step. Our manufactures of to-day, which exceed, I understand, about three times the amount of all our exportations to foreign countries, will swell in volume, and factories will be built all through these great States of the South and West, where free-trade views, according to the doctrinaires and teachers of that school, have prevailed.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, that I never find in any book or any speech taking the free-trade side any conception of the fact that the building up of manufactories adds immensely to the value of the farming lands in the neighborhood; that it adds immensely to the value of the coal and the iron ore and the zinc and the marble and the woods of the forest; ay, to the very water-powers that have been tumbling over the rocks since the beginning of creation and waiting for the hand of man to chain them up and set them to work.

Your free-trader says, "Buy where you can buy cheapest; sell where you can sell dearest;" and, as with all general terms, fraud lurketh there. As we lawyers are accustomed to say, fraud lurks in general statements. Now, if free trade is right, I hope it may prevail. If it is good for the country and for everybody, it will be good for me and for my children. But, on the other hand, we have found in this country that when we set our people to work it has been and only been when we had a tariff strong enough and high enough to shut out the products of the pauper labor of Europe and make a market for our own industrious, hard-working men, wherein they might sell their labor and secure the results of their toil and get the price for which they had wrought while it was yet to-day.

I concede, Mr. Chairman, I freely grant, that if we could always have peace between the nations, if all men spoke the same language, if equal civilization pervaded the world, we ought to have in that happy condition free trade and not a single customs office. But while we see in Europe 4,500,000 men in arms, while we see the navies of war floating over the seas of the world and carrying the flags of England and France and Spain and the rest of the great countries of the world, and while national animosities may lead to national wars, we find the necessity of taking care of our own, and seeing to it that all that ministers to human comfort, that all those things that are required in the daily uses of our common life, should be produced in our own country; and then we are independent and we are free because we are not dependent on any people, on any handicraft, on any market except our own.

This country is yet young. This country is yet undeveloped. But whenever we have started any single industry it has turned out that competition has done for us what it always has done for every people and what it must always do. It has lowered prices in the end.

Within the last ten years I have ridden in the cars from this city to Memphis, and over every foot of that ground the cars rolled over rails which were made in Birmingham, England. And yet those iron rails, those parallels of steel, went over the grandest ore-beds which have yet been found in this land. We have changed all that. And now and to-day, with our 125,000 miles of railway, we are importing scarcely a single steel rail.

What shall we do in twenty years? Why, we shall double this mileage of railways. Yes, and while I have said that now not only do we iron all our railways and not only is it true we are going to double these miles in the next generation, but as the result of the protective tariff of 1861, which was forced upon us by the exigencies and necessities of civil war, we have actually reduced, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] says, the cost of those rails to one-third.

In other words, we to-day buy steel rails at about one-third of the price we had to pay for them twenty years ago. We have employed thousands and thousands of workmen, we have opened markets for our farmers, and we have roused up an energy in our country which is shown by the building of new cities, by the construction of new furnaces, by the establishment of new centers of human industry, and by making the very forest to resound with the music of the trip-hammer and the ringing of the factory-bell.

I do not believe in the penny-wise and pound-foolish policy which would say to-day, throw open your markets to the world. Yet I am glad that the time has come when upon this floor we have men who have the courage of their opinions. I may be wrong; you may be wrong. If free trade is right, thank God we have now, and I believe for the first time in the history of our country, men upon this floor who dare say so. Casting aside all pretenses, they tell us frankly that the present bill is a step in the direction of free trade; that free trade is a consummation to which they wish to lead us.

I am glad it is so. Sooner or later in all controversies we have got to get down and discuss clean, honest principles. It was so in the old slavery days. Men talked about the curse of slavery, about the spread of slavery. That was right. Every one knew that it was a step toward the abolition of slavery. Finally and at last the two great forces were marshaled on the field of this continent, and either slavery or freedom had to go to the wall, and we all knew it. Thank God! it was slavery that went down.

And this other contest is going on in this country now. Free trade, absolute, clean, bare free trade, without any shilly-shallying, without any obstruction, is going to be the issue. The battle has been opened, and I honor the men who have the courage of their opinions and say what they mean and mean what they say.

But what have we here in this bill? Why, sir, it is the old tariff bill of 1861, with a proposition to cut it down 20 per cent., with two or three exceptions, to razee it, to plane it down; that is confessedly what this bill is. Our objection to it is this: In 1861 we tariff men did not know as much as we know now; we had not then the experience which we have acquired since 1861. The schedules of the tariff as it was made up have drifted away from us. We say that this proposition is neither wise on the one hand nor honest on the other. That is our opinion of it.

Yet I do not doubt that the gentleman who has reported this bill to the House has felt that such was his duty, and that in reporting the bill and standing by it with a loyalty which commands my respect and all my admiration he was doing a good thing for his country, because he so believed, because he believed that any measure which shall cut down our redundant revenues, which shall lower the price of foreign goods, and which shall be a step, long or short, in the direction of free trade is a consummation which he has fought for, talked for, and prayed for. And I commend the courage of the gentleman and of his supporters in manfully taking this course and throwing aside all other pretenses.

Our whole country I say is vitally interested on the one hand in maintaining a market for the labor of our men, and on the other hand in keeping open a competition of markets for the products of the farm and of the garden. Why, sirs, our food supplies which now feed the world, not only ourselves but foreign countries, are finding more and more competitors in foreign markets. Less and less in the future will be the comparative demand from foreign countries for our food supplies. On the other hand, fertility fades away toward the westward, and the wheat crop that used to be the main source of revenue of the farmer of New York has passed beyond the valley of the Genesee. No longer is Ohio the source from whence comes the food supply of Europe in the way of breadstuffs. It has passed to the prairies of Indiana and Illinois and Wisconsin, and we are tapping the fresh fields of Dakota and New Mexico, of Western Kansas, California, and Oregon.

But a better civilization is following in the pathway of the frontiersman and the pioneer. Behind them is coming the growth of the arts, the mechanic arts, which minister to all the wants of man's estate. Pennsylvania is to-day traveling to Tennessee, and Pittsburgh is finding a child at Birmingham, Ala., and another at Chattanooga, and another at Nashville, and another at Knoxville. This wave of advancing prosperity in the way of a diversification of our industries is spreading over the West and the South. The plant that is put there is happily denominated a plant; it is planted to stay.

Cities are rising, great industries are springing up. Shall we now and here enter upon a policy that shall put out the furnace-fires at Birmingham and at Pittsburgh? Shall we to-day adopt a policy that shall cause an influx of foreign goods and make glad the hearts of manufacturers in old Birmingham in England, rather than in new Birmingham in Alabama? Let the issue be sharply drawn; let facts be presented. Let it be seen that in this country wherever we have fostered industries the result has been that we have brought down the price of the commodity which comes from that industry, while we have widened the markets for that commodity, widened the demand for it, and widened the supplies which that industry has created.

As to cotton, why, sir, this country is the garden field of the world for cotton. We shall always raise the cotton which shall clothe the world. Shall we spin it and weave it? Right in the cotton-fields there is labor without employment six months in the year, as I and Southern men do know, which ought to be utilized in the spinning of that cotton. If it were woven and spun in our country the additional value given to that material would be garnered by us, and more wealth, more comfort, more of the means of livelihood would be had by the people who live in the region of the cotton fields. They in turn would buy more from the men of the Northland, from the cities of the East, from the factories of New England, from the food States of the Northwest. They would have the means to do it with. One thought I wish to give emphasis to (and I am going to close as I began) and it is this: that is the best policy for any country, for any State, for any county, for any town, for any family, which sets the most people willingly to work and gives them good pay for the labor they perform.

And that is the clean-cut distinction between freedom on the one hand and enforced labor or slavery on the other. Free thought will give this people wisdom. Free labor in our country will give us wealth, provided it be protected, provided that while in its infancy that protection is given which you would give to the child to-day, not because to-day his labor is worth anything, not because to-day he is grown to man's estate, but you see the promise of manhood in the boy, and you cultivate and educate him for what he is yet to be and to do.

I know it is said, why shall we always stand by these infant industries? A great many of them, Mr. Chairman, to-day do not need protection. We need no particular protection for American watches; they are going abroad. We need no protection for Ames's shovels; they are used in Australia. But these industries have grown up under the beneficent protection of American tariff laws; and along with them will grow up these other industries if we are wise in our day and generation and maintain the tariff as it stands to-day, not complete, not perfect, but, Mr. Chairman, the best tariff we have ever had down to the present time.

And, sir, I feel that on this question I voice the sentiment of the rising South, that land which was once the free-trade portion of our country, the land that used to send here Calhoun and John Randolph of Roanoke. To-day the land of Randolph and the land of Calhoun, freed from the blight of African slavery, is demanding a protective tariff at the hands of its representatives in Congress.

And I welcome the contest which is before us. Tennessee, the land of Jackson; Kentucky, the land of Henry Clay; Carolina, the home of Calhoun, and old Virginia, the chosen home of the Washingtons and Madisons and Jeffersons and Masons, freed from the curse of human slavery, are to-day determined that they will build up in that great Southern land a diversified industry, a wider and more magnificent civilization than has ever yet been known south of the Potomac. Her citizens are now excited on this subject, and they are clamoring to-day for tariff literature, for the facts and the figures upon this subject. They are demanding that their coal fields may be opened, that their iron mines may be dug into, that their water-powers may be utilized, that their people shall have better wages than they ever had before and larger employment and more means to make glad the homes of the Southland, and to make fair with silks and jewels her daughters in their loveliness.

We are glad this debate is on. I for one welcome it. Let us have the fullest, freest and completest discussion upon this subject. Let the question be presented to the people during the coming summer in all its manifold phases; and let the right prevail. I tell you, gentlemen, that away yonder in November there is a tornado coming, and it is not going to be a free-trade tornado by any sort of means.

American markets for American workmen, the largest liberty for all, the widest diversification of our industries, the largest prosperity for our common land—these, Mr. Chairman, are the sentiments which I wish to voice here in behalf of my constituents. [Applause.]

Mr. HALSELL. Mr. Chairman, the statements made by the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means in opposition to the passage of the bill under consideration are in striking contrast with the recommendations of the President of the United States in his message to the Forty-seventh Congress. He said:

> To make a start in the proposed reduction of the revenue from imports the Tariff Commission had been created. In good faith it undertook the work. In its report to Congress it said early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded, not by a mere indiscriminate popular clamor, but by the best conservative opinion of the country.
> Such a reduction of existing tariff the commission regards not only as a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction. Entertaining these views, the commission has sought to present a scheme of tariff duties in which substantial reduction should be the distinguishing feature. The average reduction in rates, including that from the enlargement of the free-list and the abolition of duties on charges and commissions, at which the commission has aimed, is not less on the average than 20 per cent., and it is the opinion of the commission that the reduction will reach 25 per cent.

He further said, recognizing the unmistakable demand of the conservative opinion of the country for a reduction of tariff duties and the justness of that demand:

> I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendations of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government. It will be remembered that I urged upon the attention of Congress at its last session the importance of relieving the industry and enterprise from the pressure of unnecessary taxation. It is one of the tritest maxims of political economy that all taxes are burdensome, however wisely and prudently imposed.
> And though there have always been among our people wide differences of sentiment as to the best methods of raising the national revenues, and indeed as to the principles upon which taxation should be based, there has been substantial accord in the doctrine that only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the Government. Of late the public revenues have far exceeded that limit, and unless checked by appropriate legislation such excesses will continue to increase from year to year. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, the surplus revenue amounted to $100,000,000; for the fiscal year ended 30th June last the surplus revenue amounted to $145,000,000. The report of the Secretary shows what disposition has been made of these moneys. They have not only answered the requirements of the sinking fund, but have afforded a large balance applicable to other reductions of the public debt.
> But I renew the expression of my conviction that such rapid extinguishment of the national indebtedness as is now taking place is by no means a cause for congratulation; it is a cause rather for serious apprehension. If it continues, it must be speedily followed by one of the evil results so clearly set forth in the report of the Secretary. Either the surplus must lie idle in the Treasury or the Government will be forced to buy at market rates its bonds not then redeemable, and which under such circumstances can not fail to command an enormous premium, or the swollen revenues will be devoted to extravagant expenditure, which, as experience has taught, is ever the bane of an overflowing Treasury.
> It was made apparent, in the course of the animated discussions which this question aroused at the last session of Congress, that the policy of diminishing the revenue by reducing taxation commanded the general approval of the members of both Houses. I regret that because of conflicting views as to the best methods by which that policy should be made operative none of its benefits have as yet been reaped.

These were wise and patriotic statements, and such as should always characterize the Chief Executive of a great nation. They looked to the interest of a whole country, not alone to the special interest as to a particular locality, not exclusively to Pennsylvania's pig-iron interest, not to Ohio's wool, but to all the great interests of the nation. The important question now for the consideration of the American Congress is, if a substantial reduction of tariff duties was demanded by the best conservative opinion of the country in 1883, has the revision of the tariff by the last Congress in its practical operations met that demand required by the "best conservative opinion of the country?"

Under the law existing prior to the act of March, 1883, the value of dutiable merchandise imported into the United States for six months ending December 30, 1882, was $260,856,273, and the duty paid was $111,266,000, or 42.65 per cent. on the value; and under the act of March 3, 1883, the value of dutiable merchandise imported for six months ending December 31, 1883, was $235,898,109, and the duties paid amounted to $96,514,136 or 40.91 per cent. on the value thereof. Thus it will be seen that instead of the reduction of 20 or 25 per cent. as was contemplated by the commission, it is only 1.74 per cent. on the basis of the above values. So that if it was a "measure of justice to consumers" in 1883 that there ought to be a substantial reduction of tariff duties, and was demanded by the best conservative opinion of the country, that same measure of justice to consumers and that same demand by the best conservative opinion of the country exist now with as much, or more, force as then.

Yet, sir, in the face of the statements of the Tariff Commission, whose duty it was to investigate the question, and the recommendations of the President, we are told by the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], that "the reduction proposed by the bill now under consideration is 20 per cent., and it is a noteworthy fact that not a single interest in the United States has asked for it: neither the manufacturer, the miner, the laborer, the farmer, nor the consumer has requested or demanded the proposed reduction. On the contrary, every interest, manufacturing, laboring, and agricultural, represented before the Committee on Ways and Means, have protested most earnestly against the change recommended by the majority of the committee."

Now, sir, I do not know who was before that committee, but I have no doubt but that the manufacturer and the monopolist were there protesting against having their immense profits cut down by reducing the duty on imported goods coming in competition with their "infant" industries.

The poor, oppressed, tax-ridden farmer, laborer, and consumer were not there. They had not the time nor money to become lobbyists to demand that their burdens should be lightened. They must remain at home and labor and economize to pay their tribute money to the manufacturer and monopolist, who are by this tribute money enabled to travel in magnificent style to the nation's capital and appear before the Committee of Ways and Means and seek to have the fetters which have for twenty long years bound the laboring man made more secure.

Sir, these men must rely on their Representatives for relief. They have instructed them what to do. Their voice was heard in the tidal wave which swept the country in 1882, speaking in no uncertain sound for relief from the heavy burdens they have so long endured. That voice, sir, is still ringing in the ears of their Representatives on this floor and demanding of them to redeem their pledges made to break the manacles and set them free. These heavy burdens were placed upon the people, and they were told that it was for a temporary purpose, that it was necessary to pay the enormous debt incurred by the war of the rebellion.

A patriotic people submitted to the burden without a murmur, and worked and toiled through summer's heat and winter's cold that the Government might meet her obligations and maintain her honor, but now, since that temporary necessity no longer exists for the imposition of these heavy burdens and a surplus of $150,000,000 is in the Treasury, an oppressed people demand that they be relieved. They are met by the protectionist in response to that demand that "it will disturb business." It will of necessity force down the price of labor in the United States; it will stimulate imports, increase competition from abroad, which can only be successfully met by reducing the cost of labor or material or both of the home product. The President, in his message to Congress referred to, said in reference to the reduction of revenue from imports, "though it may be temporarily inconvenient, it will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction."

The reduction proposed by the bill under consideration is no greater than that contemplated by the Tariff Commission, and as no substantial reduction was effected by the operations of the act of March 3, 1883, no greater disturbance of business would follow the passage of this bill than would have taken place had the expected reductions in that bill been realized. The reasoning of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means is that the heavy import duties and war-tariff taxes must continue to oppress the great body of the American people for all time to come for fear that a reduction will "disturb business." Sir, this argument is an insult to the laboring men of this country. Are their hard earnings to be extorted from them and go into the pockets of the favored class for fear that the apprehensions of the timid may be realized and business be disturbed?

The surplus revenue of over $100,000,000 comes mostly from the agriculturists, and the manufacturers who are the recipients of this extortion have united against those engaged in the unprotected industries, backed by a great monopoly money-power, to prevent them from getting relief. Sir, no free people on earth have ever submitted to such drafts upon their hard earnings as the laboring people of the United States. Their just demands were disregarded by the party in power in the last Congress, notwithstanding the recommendation of the President. The Republican Congress failing to respond to the "best conservative opinion of the country," that sentiment was emphasized in the election to the Forty-eighth Congress of a large majority of Democrats, pledged to meet that just and reasonable demand. Shall they be disappointed again?

The people, despairing of getting any relief from the Republican party, have turned their eyes to the grand old Democratic party, which is pledged to tariff reform. Thousands upon top of thousands who have been acting with that party are deserting it and joining the Democratic party, on whose banners are inscribed in letters of living light, "Tariff reform and an honest and economical administration of the Government." Under these banners they will march in triumph to victory in November next. In advance of that victory the people are looking to this Congress to break the shackles which have bound them for nearly a quarter of a century.

Just as long as it was necessary to raise a revenue to meet the obligations of the Government, although it resulted in enriching the manufactures of the country, they did not protest; but when there is no longer a necessity for the imposition of heavy burdens and the Treasury is overflowing with money they are unwilling longer to have the results of their sweat and toil pour into the pockets of the "favored few" to swell their princely fortunes. I deny that the reduction of the tariff will be detrimental to the interest of labor. In the first place wages are high in this country on account of the natural advantages we have over other countries.

Our vast territory of rich soil enables the people by the use of the best machinery of any nation in the world to have a large product of labor, and in the next place the import duties on the necessaries of life average 40.91 per cent., and by reason of this tariff the home commodity is enhanced often to the full extent of the tariff duty; consequently wages must be higher than in countries where no such duties are imposed. But if these duties were taken off wages would not be reduced a greater per cent. than they are increased by reason of the tariff; consequently the purchasing power of the wages paid would be equal to that which is now paid. "It will stimulate imports, increase competition from abroad, which can only be successfully met by reducing the cost of labor or material, or both, of the home product." I have already shown that a reduction of the tariff can not injuriously affect labor.

The stimulation of imports and the increase of competition from a reduction of tariff duties would be of great benefit to the whole people, except the greedy manufacturer. It would cut down his 37 per cent. profit on his capital to a reasonable profit, and thus enable the workingman to save some of the fruits of his labor. Nothing is truer than that statement, which has been made a thousand times, that under the operations of the protective-tariff system the rich have been made richer and the poor have been made poorer. It has created powerful monopolies all over the country, and they have made combinations to perpetuate their power, and when there is an attempt to reduce the heavy burdens on the people they are always on hand to resist it. The result of these oppressions has been to divide the people into two classes, the rich and the poor, between whom there has been engendered a feeling of bitterness, and thus the whole social economy is being disturbed.

A reduction of tariff duties will not reduce the cost of material of home products. It is a well-settled principle in political economy that the cost of any commodity depends upon the supply and demand. This principle holds good in every article of commerce.

Another objection urged by the minority of the committee to the passage of this bill and the reduction of the tariff is, "the proposed reduction will inevitably increase foreign importations, and as a consequence will, as all experience teaches, increase our revenues, to which every interest of the country is opposed. I will not stop to inquire whether the result would be as stated; but if it be true, it affords a splendid opportunity for doing that which it is very desirable should be done—abolish internal taxation, and thus relieve the country of that army of collectors, deputy collectors, gaugers, storekeepers, clerks, inspectors, and other employés engaged in that department. The whole theory of the protectionists is a sham and a falsehood.

The hideous monster is being unmasked. The thin veil of hypocrisy is being removed. The constantly increasing facilities for the diffusion of knowledge among the masses of the people have afforded them an opportunity for the investigation of the various questions affecting their interest, and they are now coming to their own conclusions, and are no longer deceived by designing demagogues. Information is no longer confined to the great centers of thought, but the most obscure corners of our country are supplied with abundant means of information. The subject of the tariff is better understood by the masses of the people of the United States to-day than at any previous period in her history. Hence the urgent demand made by the large majority of the people for relief from this terrible slavery. The reduction of the tariff will not close the manufactories, neither will it be detrimental to manufactures, but on the contrary will stimulate them, by enabling us to export more largely than we do now under the present system. This proposition is based on sound reason, and philosophy and history demonstrate its truthfulness.

This country possesses advantages for manufacturing superior to any country in the world. In her bosom lie embedded inexhaustible mines of coal and iron. Her water-power is unequaled. The vast cotton fields of the South, the illimitable plains of the West for the raising of sheep, the magnificent forests, and the finest machinery of any country, all combine to invite the enterprising to utilize these great agencies of wealth; but on account of the irrational and outrageous tariff system, adopted in the supposed interest of manufacture, they remain comparatively unappropriated, and thus by unwise legislation these grand gifts of nature for the extension of the glory and grandeur of our country are thrown away. This miserable system of protection has crippled our enterprise, and other countries more wise are reaping a golden harvest from the trade of the world. Shall this condition of things longer exist, or shall the American Congress be equal to the importance of the subject, and by a wise reduction of tariff duties place our country where she justly belongs, in the lead of the world commercially.

It has been truthfully said that experience is a wise teacher. Let us be taught by the experience of other nations. Forty years ago England had a protective tariff, and under it her manufactures went down to the lowest ebb. After a long experience she discovered the secret of her drooping industries. The protective tariff was taken off, and the result was that her manufacturing interest began at once to revive, and she stands in the front rank of the commerce of the world. Not only have her manufacturing interests been promoted, but wages were raised from 30 to 50 per cent. As a further proof of the fallacy of the argument of the protectionists, wages are higher in England without protection than in Germany with protection. England employs in her textile industries about 1,000,000 hands and 650,000 hands in her metal manufactures. Her manufactures are found everywhere.

In 1881 in woolen goods and yarns the exports of England were $103,000,000, and the United States only $400,000. This is a most humiliating exhibit for this great country. The American mills, as shown by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] on this floor a few days ago, can manufacture double what they now do. Why is this? The answer is easy. The enhanced price of the manufactured article on account of the duty on wool has placed it out of competition with the foreign article where no such tariff exists. The mills are not in operation more than half the time.

Another humiliating spectacle is presented by the United States in the exports of her cotton goods to those countries which by reason of location are our natural customers. I mean Mexico, Central America, British Honduras, British West Indies, United States of Colombia, Venezuela, British Guiana, Brazil, Uruguay, Argentine Republic, Chili, Ecuador, and Peru.

In 1880 the exports to these countries from the United States were $3,899,400, while England to the same countries exported $51,235,000, $48,335,600 more than the United States. England buys our cotton, manufactures it, and sells the manufactured article so cheap that we are driven out of the markets almost at our door, and all the result of our tariff system. The textile fabrics made in this country are $521,300,000; of that amount we export $10,216,576 and import $122,350,000. Sir, this is an alarming state of facts, especially in view of another important fact, and that is the danger of our agricultural products being excluded from foreign nations.

The agricultural industry contributes 77 per cent. of the whole of our exports and the manufacturing only about 12 per cent. Our agricultural exports have very largely increased in the last twenty years. In 1880 the value of our breadstuff exported amounted to $288,000,000 and provisions to $152,000,000, so that the exports of our grain and provisions are of the highest importance to us. While we have had this large export trade in grain and provisions for many years, there have sprung up some powerful rivals in the grain trade, to wit: Russia, Australia, India, Algeria, and some other countries. They have been watching with jealous eye this large trade in grain, and are determined to compete with us for it. There has been a fresh impetus given to the production of grain in these countries, and already we have felt its influence. It is estimated that we have exported 40,000,000 bushels less up to this time than was estimated. The cause no doubt is that India and the other countries I have mentioned have largely increased their exportation the last few years.

In 1879 India exported 2,000,000 bushels; in 1880, 4,000,000; in 1883, 36,000,000. The soil of India is as well adapted to the cultivation of wheat as that of the United States. It is estimated that she has 20,000,000 acres adapted to its culture, and that these lands are constantly being improved and becoming more productive, and it is estimated that instead of 240,000,000 bushels now produced in a few years the yield will be double, so that with the constantly increasing exports from these countries with their cheap transportation they will drive the United States from the markets she has heretofore had. England, always watchful of her interest, is encouraging India, and is doing everything she can to cheapen the carrying of her products.

The great danger now to the United States is that by reason of the encouragement given those countries, and especially India, in the raising of grain, there will be an overproduction, and one of our important exports will be cut off or greatly crippled. The protectionists, recognizing the situation, have seized upon these facts as arguments in favor of their theory. They say, threatened with the loss of foreign markets for our breadstuffs, we must extend our home market, the establishment of diversified industries, the increase of workers in trades, manufactures, commerce and transportation, who will exchange their labor for the products of agriculture, the creation of a home demand for the fruits of the earth.

Sir, it is the greatest folly to talk about throwing up a Chinese wall around the United States and confining her industries within her own limits. They say that if our farm-stuffs are not going abroad more than ever do we need protection, in order that we may find use for them at home. I admit, in view of the facts I have referred to in reference to our grain exports, that it is necessary that labor should be diversified, so that if there is an overproduction of agricultural products the laborer can find employment in manufactures; but that can never be done as long as the protective tariff policy is adhered to.

History shows that a high tariff is detrimental to the manufacturing interest. I have shown that when England had a high tariff her manufactures drooped, but so soon as the burdens were removed they sprang into new life, and are in more prosperous condition to-day than ever before. From 1850 to 1860, when the United States had the lowest tariff she had had since 1812, her manufactures increased more rapidly than they ever did before or since. So that the only way to meet the dangers from overproduction of agricultural products is to encourage manufactures, and take from agriculture a part of its productive power and place it in manufactures and thus diversify labor, which can only be done by removing the burdens on raw material and thereby cheapen the cost of production and cheapen the cost of transportation.

Sir, the laboring people all over this country are becoming alarmed, and well they may be. They are looking forward to the near future with fearful apprehension. They are constantly on strikes for higher wages. Manufacturing establishments are constantly suspending operations and the operatives thrown out of employment. The result of these things is that they are forming powerful associations everywhere for the purpose, if possible, of averting the terrible storm that is threatening to burst with fearful fury upon their heads. They have seen powerful corporations and monopolies made rich off their labor and toil, and when they appeal to the legislative department of the Government for relief they are met by these corporations and monopolists bringing all their power to bear to prevent them from being relieved.

The laborer and mechanic have made America the grandest country on the earth. They have transformed the wilderness into the fruitful fields and flowery gardens. Beautiful cities have sprung up all over this fair land by their magic touch. They have brought the remote parts of this large country into almost daily communication by means of railroads. And yet as a reward for their toil and labor their lives are made miserable by employers and corporations. This condition of things can not much longer exist. Those laboring men who have brought the country to her glory and greatness will assert their rights and their power at the ballot-box, and will hurl from power the party which has turned a deaf ear to their petition for clothing and bread for their wives and children. The laboring man is told by the protectionist that it is for his benefit that manufacturers must be protected. The manufacturer tells him unless his "industry" is protected he can not pay him wages adequate to his needs. I will call your attention to some facts to show the generous sympathy he has with the laborer who works in his factory.

The census reports for 1880 show there were in the United States 1,005 establishments engaged in the production of iron and steel. They employed 133,203 males of the age of over 16 years, and, including 66 females, 7,775 below that age. The capital invested was $230,971,874. The whole value of the steel and iron products is stated at $296,557,685. The materials used were $191,271,150, and the wages paid were $55,476,785. The total amount of materials used and wages paid amounted to $246,747,935, which, deducted from the total value of the products, leaves $49,809,750, the gross profits, which is equal to 21.56 per cent. on the capital invested, while the wages paid to the employés amounted to $393.50 per annum per capita, or $1.31 per day. In the same year it is shown in the steel manufacture the profit on the capital invested was 67 per cent., and the average wages paid was $1.50 per capita per day.

The iniquity of protection is made further and more strikingly manifest when the operative comes to expend the wages he has been paid for clothes to protect his children from the cold blasts of winter. He pays back to the manufacturer $1.64 of his wages for one dollar's worth of the goods he himself has manufactured. In other words, his dollar of wages pays for 36 cents of goods. He is told that unless the manufacturers are protected he will be in the same condition of the pauper laborer of Europe. Protectionists are constantly parading the condition of the laborers in the factories of England. They represent them as being in a most miserable and wretched condition of poverty and almost starvation, but occasionally we find a protectionist who has investigated the subject to learn for himself whether or not what he has heard is true of their condition, and to make history true he speaks out that frankly which he has seen.

A correspondent of the Pittsburgh Dispatch, a protection paper, writing from Birmingham, England, which is one of the largest manufacturing places in the United Kingdom, says:

> And now let me say briefly, and once for all, that a careful inspection of the localities where working people most do congregate in this wonderful world of manufactures has proved to me, as it will prove to any one taking similar pains, that here, where one expects to find pauper labor by comparison with America, there is a condition of comfort in habitation, clothing, and food which can not be exceeded in any Americanmanufacturing locality. This may be treason, but if it is, my protectionists friends are at liberty to make the most of it. I do not assert that the condition of these workmen is what it ought to be. I only assert that if it be worse than that of American workmen, then the difference is concealed with wonderful success. I am not advancing, by any means, the opinion that it is time to apply the theory of free trade to America, but merely reiterating what I have often said and always believed, that the assertion of Republican politicians that protection was in the interest of the workingman was buncombe, for if it was of any benefit at all the workingman got none of it, but the capitalist all.
> If I was not altogether certain of my premises then, I am now. I will agree to exhibit better houses for working people, with just as ample food and comfortable clothing and as many bank deposits in this Birmingham district, according to ratio of population, as can be found in any manufacturing district of America. It would make the most loyal Pittsburgher ashamed of his own city to note here the actual superiority in comfort and cleanliness of the streets and houses where live the common working classes. Courts, alleys, and domiciles are clean, and lack the foul odors which are smelled everywhere on the back streets and alleys of Pittsburgh. I searched in vain for a plague-spot. I asked for the location where there were the most poor and went there. I propounded all sorts of impudent questions to the inhabitants. I penetrated to the obscurist courts and alleys, making inquiries for imaginary persons my excuse, and my conclusion was that so far as we must have a poor class—a class which must struggle hard for bare necessaries—it would be well to have them live as they do here, if possible. Everything, too, speaks of good government. Hell-holes, such as exist in some parts of Pittsburgh, seem to be unknown here. The gin-mills and tap-rooms are compelled to close promptly at the hour fixed by law. To judge from the police statistics, crime is here reduced to a minimum.

The same appeals made to-day to the laborers of this country by the protectionists were made to the laborers of England forty years ago when she had a high protective tariff as we have now. The laborer was told then that if the tariff was reduced the manufactories would be closed and they thrown out of employment and that their wives and children would come to want. The most frightful pictures of ruin and desolation were constantly presented to their gaze. They were kept in doubt and uncertainty. They were told that the importation of cheap goods coming in competition with their manufactures would close their mills, shops, and founderies, and that bankruptcy and ruin would ensue. These are familiar arguments to us. We have heard them on the other side of this House from the beginning of this discussion. Under the withering blows struck at the monopolies of Great Britain she was induced to reduce her oppressive tariff duties. Did it close her factories, mills, and shops? Forty years' experience answers the question. In 1840 her exports of merchandise amounted to the sum of $310,000,000. In 1882 her exports of merchandise amounted to $1,533,000,000.

The laboring people in the United States, as they did in England, have come to the conclusion that the arguments of the protectionists for a high duty on imports are a fraud and a delusion. About five hundred of the Paterson silk-weavers I learn have prepared a memorial to Congress asking that the policy of high protection on imports be abandoned.

Their reasoning, as gathered by a reporter of the Sun, is as follows:

> No matter what the tariff was, the working class received no benefit from it; their wages were neither advanced when the tariff was increased, nor were they reduced when it was lowered; their condition is worse every day, while the manufacturers have all got rich, build mansions, drive fancy turnouts, extend and beautify their mills, and live a life of luxury, all on the strength of the protective tariff, which is supposed to benefit employé and employer alike, but which in fact benefits the latter.

Sir, the issue is squarely presented in this bill. Shall there be a reduction of the war tariff of 20 per cent., or shall the same oppression remain upon the people which has been upon them for twenty years? Shall the poor workingman still continue to contribute his labor for the further enriching of the manufacturer? These are the questions which this Congress must settle. I appeal to the Democratic members of this House to stand by the traditions of the party, and come to the rescue of an oppressed people. The reductions proposed are moderate and reasonable. Shall this Congress, with a surplus of over $100,000,000 in the Treasury, still continue that surplus by taking it from the pockets of the people?

The Republican party, under the pretext of raising money by high import duties to pay the public debt of the United States, have betrayed the people and turned them over to the tender mercies of the monopolists whom they have created all over this country. Under the protective policy of that party the large part of the wealth of this great nation has been centered in the pockets of a few individuals. If this protective policy is continued much longer, almost the entire wealth of this country will be held by a few intolerant moneyed aristocrats, and the great body of the people will be hewers of wood and drawers of water for them.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my intention to speak upon this bill. So many members more experienced in legislation than myself have manifested a desire to engage in the tariff discussion that I had determined to content myself with attending to those duties assigned me in this Congress. But it is now evident that party alignments are to be made upon the tariff issue in the approaching Presidential campaign, and, holding very decided views upon the questions involved, I shall take the opportunity offered me at this session to express them as the discussion proceeds. I hear the Democracy called upon to rally around their traditions, and I am not surprised; for about all there is left of Democratic principle is a tradition.

Had I not believed it before I should now be certain that there is a resurrection, for the discussion upon this bill and every other political discussion in this House since the present Congress assembled has been a constant resurrection of dead and buried doctrines. The small-clothes of an infant Republic are brought out from the closet, held up to our admiring gaze, and the great nation of to-day is asked to clothe itself in these habiliments of fifty years ago.

After nearly a quarter of a century of prosperous existence under a tariff system designed to protect and encourage American industry, we are invited to a review of its effects, and the Democratic party, encouraged by its return to power in this House, now appeals to the people for approval upon the issue of tariff reform and ultimate free trade, and we have just been gravely told that the election of this Democratic House was a deliberate approval of its tariff policy and a command to proceed with the work of re-establishing the doctrines of old-time Democracy.

Now, I do not remember events just that way. It occurs to me that the last national campaign in which the tariff was made a distinctive issue was in 1880, and that the result of that campaign was the election of a Republican President and the return of a Republican House to succeed a Democratic one.

If my memory is not at fault, we were settling some of our family difficulties two years ago, disciplining each other in a friendly way, so that we might be the better equipped for the contest of 1884, and thus you gentlemen of the other side got the benefit of our dissensions.

If gentlemen are desirous of knowing the will of the people upon the issue presented by this bill they will find it in the verdict of 1880 and the triumph of the Republican party. I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, and am not proposing to make cheap capital by prophesying what will be the result of the election next November. It is sufficient for me to consider what ought to be the result.

If I understand the political philosophy of free-trade and revenue-tariff Democrats, it is that any attempt to direct, regulate, or interfere with the world's commerce or in any way to erect legal barriers against absolute freedom of trade between the people of different nations is wrong in principle and injurious in results, violative of natural rights and destructive of individual prosperity. Because import duties at the ports of entry do interfere with the freedom of trade between this and other countries, according to the doctrines of the free-traders they ought not to be imposed. On the other hand, those of us who do believe that it is within the legitimate province of law to encourage and build up the industries of the country assert that it is not only not injurious but is productive of the greatest benefit to impose such duties, not only to obtain revenue but to protect our labor and preserve our market. And yet the Democratic party, in another direction, is a protectionist party, for they joined us in enacting a law to prevent Chinese immigration, an act both of protection and prohibition.

What, pray, was the purpose of that law if it was not to protect the American laborer from being obliged to compete in the labor markets of this country with cheap Chinese labor? To be consistent you ought to repeal that law and to vote against that other bill now upon the House Calendar, to restrict foreign immigration to this country under labor contracts, a bill which I venture to assert very few of your number will care to oppose. The Chinese have learned to live cheaply, to have few wants and fewer hopes, and can therefore, if permitted to come freely to our shores, drive American labor out of all the labor markets or force them to come down to the Chinese standard of living and acting. Can any gentleman point out the difference between the Chinaman supplying our markets with the product of his labor here or the product of the same kind of labor in his own country? In either event the profits are not retained here to beget new industries and enhance our wealth.

When I am told that it is not the province of the law-making power to interfere with the natural laws of trade, that commerce knows no national boundaries, and that it is an interference with natural right to deny to other nations as free an entrance into our markets as is enjoyed by our own citizens, I answer it is and ever has been and ever will be the business of legislation to supplement the labors of individuals in directing, diversifying, and augmenting the industries of the country.

In opening common highways, in aiding the construction of railroads and canals, in tunneling mountains and bridging rivers, in improving rivers and harbors, in establishing post-routes and telegraph lines, we are but using the law-making power to bring the people and the products of their industry into useful communion and profitable interchange. We are simply making it possible that the wants of the people may be supplied, that life may be made enjoyable, and the products of labor may find a market. We pass laws to regulate the traffic on railroads.

We limit the amount which may be taken as interest; we fix the hackman's charges and the miller's tolls; we prohibit combinations to forestall the market. Everywhere, in all our statute-books, are laws designed to control and direct and diversify our commerce and trade within our own borders, and no political party is bold enough to question the expediency of such laws. We go further still, and enter the sacred precinct of home, and compel the attendance of children at school. We fix the age and limit the hours for the performance of labor, all very shocking, no doubt, to Democratic traditions of pioneer life or of unpaid labor. In the daily appeals with which we are entertained for a return to the customs of the fathers we can almost hear the music of the spinning-wheel and the hand-loom.

Still I suppose the other side of the House will concede that these laws are tolerable, because they only affect ourselves. It is another question to interfere with the freedom of trade as applied to the inhabitants of other countries. If an English laborer, or even an English monopolist, wants an untaxed entry into our markets for the products of his mill or his mine, it is both unconstitutional and impolitic to deny the privilege, if you are right in your reckoning. It will not do to encourage the opening our iron mines and thereby utilize our natural wealth, or the sinking of coal-shafts that our coal deposits may be made use of, for in so doing we are interfering with the natural right to buy in the cheapest markets. If my lands are less productive than yours, if you can raise corn and wheat cheaper than I can, on that account I must let my lands lie idle and buy of you, because you can afford to sell cheaper than I can produce. It matters nothing that I may be idle the while, that my land may grow up in weeds, its capacities for production be lost; being idle I may have nothing to buy with; still, as it is nature's law and democratic politics, I must be content, forgetting that the proposition is a temporizing one, and that the cheap article of to-day may be the dear one of to-morrow because I have ceased to produce.

Fortunately, theories may sometimes be overturned by facts, and we are not without facts to guide us. From 1833 to 1861, with two short exceptions, the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue only prevailed in this country. From 1861 to 1865 we were engaged in the destructive business of war, war within our own borders and among ourselves, a war which withdrew millions of our people from the business of producing and engaged them in the work of destruction. For the succeeding ten years we were engaged in repairing the destruction and losses resulting from war.

In the eight years terminating June 30, 1883, our exports of merchandise exceeded our imports more than $1,300,000,000. In the previous forty years our imports of merchandise exceeded our exports $1,600,000,000 in round numbers, specie values.

In that forty years we consumed products of the value of $1,600,000,000 more than we produced in this country exclusive of gold and silver and not including permanent improvements and property on hand and used in business. From 1835 to 1861, inclusive, there were only seven years in which we exported more merchandise than we imported.

And yet, after we had recovered from the effects and made up the losses resulting from war, and a sufficient time had elapsed for the results of our protective policy to be fully manifested, it only took eight years to make up all except $300,000,000 of this poverty-producing drain upon our resources.

In the same forty-eight years we exported more than we imported of coin and bullion more than $1,000,000,000, and in the forty years, not including the last eight, $1,100,000,000 in round numbers, so that some $700,000,000 of this sum must have gone to pay interest on the debts created by this policy of buying in the cheap markets of other countries instead of encouraging the development of our God-given resources, keeping our money at home to employ and pay our own laborers, to increase our wealth and means of happiness. Here was gold and silver amounting to two-thirds as much as all of our coin and paper circulation to-day sent out of the country, most of it to try the costly experiment of competing with the accumulated capital of centuries, the cheap labor, the grinding poverty, and the buried hopes which Old World systems have produced. More than $400,000,000 of this coin and bullion went out from us between 1850 and 1860.

By the acquisition of California and the discovery of its rich gold mines we were apparently able to live under this oppressive competition, but in 1860 we discovered that it was but an appearance. With this gold kept in the country it would have been impossible for our banking system to have collapsed as it did. With this gold retained in the land of its production a paper currency, with a nation's wealth pledged for its redemption, could not have been discredited so that $2 of it were worth less than one of coin.

If low tariff means anything it means larger importations and less consumption of home products, and therefore less work for American laborers, unless at the same time this system enables us to find a larger market abroad.

It is a little difficult to discover the wisdom of transporting our products to distant countries when if we will we may have a market for the same product at home. The export and import statistics prove that low tariff does not enlarge our foreign market. Stated concisely, free trade or a tariff for revenue only mean unrestricted competition with the capital, the labor, and the methods of living in all countries. It means that the American producer of whatever kind must be able to place his goods at the door of the consumer and sell them as cheaply as can the English or German or French or Chinese producer, and at a living profit, or that the American producer must surrender the market to his foreign competitor, and by so doing again narrow the field of competition and leave the consumer once more at the mercy of the importer. Free raw material means that the American mine-owner and his workmen must place his ore and his coal at the door of the manufacturer in free competition with the same class of producers in other countries, and, failing to do so, must leave his ores unmined, his coal in its native bed, and so again narrow the boundaries of competition and remove an inducement to fair profit and reasonable prices; and this is done at the expense of sending our money out of the country and of leaving our native wealth unused.

In discussing the wool question a few days ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] urged a reduction of the tariff on wool, that we might have cheap woolens, cheap clothing for the laboring men, and then, with ready resource, he showed to the wool-growers that low tariffs in the past had resulted in high-priced wool.

His figures were correct, the process simple; with our markets thrown open to an almost unrestricted entry of foreign wools and woolens, who wonders that the flocks went to the slaughter-houses, that a great industry was destroyed, that production was diminished, that the price of wool went up, that cheaper clothing proved a delusion, and that the balance-sheet of trade against us grew larger and larger, while the demand for labor grew less and less.

Since the commencement of this session of Congress we have heard almost daily complaints that England has usurped the carrying trade on the high seas, and that the glory of the American merchant marine has departed. It is claimed that this result has been brought about by high tariffs; that if we were permitted to invest our money in English raw material and import free of tax we could then build iron ships and compete successfully for ocean traffic. Again I ask gentlemen to use their memories. I trust they have not forgotten that our shipping was driven from the seas by English cruisers; that while we were engaged in a life and death struggle for American unity England was lending aid and comfort to the enemy and at the same time taking possession of the carrying business on the sea. That when we were able to turn our attention to this business we found ourselves superseded, and were driven to commence anew to build a merchant marine to compete not only with the possession, but with wealth untold.

But it does not stop here. Free-trade England, with all her faith in the efficacy of her theories, especially when she wants an opportunity to drive us out of our own markets, was not content to allow even this unequal competition. With bounties liberal beyond measure, with release of taxation, with liberal protection, she has made competition impossible.

If there is any conclusion to be drawn from this condition of things, it is that protection of some kind has enabled England to hold on to her ill-gotten advantage, and that America must reduce the price of all labor which enters into ship-building and the production of building materials at least 30 per cent. before she can build ships as cheaply as England can; that we must give equal bounties and employ English seamen before we can use the vessels when built; and taken together it proves that we can not open our markets to free competition without a destruction of a large part of our industries, and consequently of our power to keep our millions of wage-workers in profitable employment.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat has drawn us a picture of American poverty. Other gentlemen during the course of this debate, by a curious system of figuring, have shown us what insignificant wages our American laborers, skilled and unskilled, are earning as compared with the cost of living, all intended to show how happy the English workman is under free trade and how miserably poor the American laborer is under protection. I shall not be surprised to hear it demonstrated before this discussion ends that the greatest boon that can be given to our laboring people is a decrease of wages. It may go to the extent that no wages at all would be a blessing if coupled with the privilege of looking at well-filled stores of cheap foreign-made goods.

Of course we have poverty here. It is landed upon our shores in the shape of 600,000 men, women, and children from across the water every year. An army of unskilled laborers, most of them moneyless, unaccustomed to our ways of living and working, strangers in a strange land, come hither to our tax-oppressed land to find a home and the work and the pay that they could not find in the land of their birth. But they are not America's poor; they are Europe's poor. And because American enterprise and capital can not always develop new industries fast enough to absorb this never-ending tide of unskilled labor, our protective system is held responsible. What other nation ever did or ever could take care of such an emigrant army of full-grown workers—workers who must find employment or starve?

Is our system to blame because we have not yet discovered some statutory process of creating wealth, that we may distribute it to them on their arrival? They know, if you do not, that the strong, the temperate, and frugal come here to prospective homes of comfort, to schools for their children, and to declining age unfretted by care for the morrow. We have no need to consult the tables in the Census Reports to know that the largest half of our laboring population, foreign and native, live in homes which they own. We need only consult our memory and then use our eyes to know that we have largely increased our means of comfort since 1861.

Compare the furnishing of the houses of to-day of the farmer, the cottager, laborer with the furnishing of twenty-five years ago, and it is a transformation that centuries have failed to work in other countries. Under a protective tariff we have learned to earn, to produce, and to appreciate these comforts—the luxuries of other lands; and we have done this without enhancing the price.

I had occasion a few days ago to find out the retail price of such articles as the farmer and the artisan usually buy, in 1859–'60 and in 1883–'84, taken from a merchant's books in a Western village. These goods were purchased in the same wholesale market, means of transportation and other incidents affecting cost not materially changed, and I find that none of these articles are dearer and many of them are cheaper now than they were in 1859–'60, and it must be borne in mind that the retail price is the cost to the farmer and the artisan.

It was asserted last evening in the course of this debate that farmers were heavily burdened in getting their produce to market owing to the heavy duty on those articles which are used in constructing and operating railroads. Yet the freight charges on American railroads to-day are less than a half of what they were in 1860. In short, I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that everything a farmer buys in the shape of clothing and farming utensils and in the freighting of his produce to market, kind for kind and quality for quality, is cheaper under a protective tariff to-day than it was under a revenue tariff and unrestricted competition with other countries in 1860. Still we are told the farmers are taxed to death or to poverty, and yet we are constantly reminded of the dangers threatening by the sending hither of vast capital to buy up large bodies of our land. Taxed to death, and yet capital is constantly seeking landed investment and we are enacting laws to preserve our unoccupied domain for the use of the actual settlers.

If gentlemen would learn the secret of this enhancement of the value of lands they would find it in the fact that a farmer's outgo s for all he requires to cultivate his farm, except labor, are less and the net selling price of his products is greater than under the old tariff system. I am not unmindful of the fact that from 1873 to 1880 farm lands were greatly depressed in price in the Western States; nor am I unmindful of the other fact, that in the flush times of inflated currency, when speculation was rife, we borrowed largely from the East and from Europe and mortgaged our farms to secure repayment, and that thereafter we sent away all the net profits of farming to pay the high rate of interest, so that nothing was left to stimulate trade, to develop new industries; and as a necessary sequence when pay-day came we were unprepared for it, our lands were thrown upon the market for what they would bring, and that many men were bankrupted before we finally lifted the incubus of debt from our shoulders and ceased to pay tribute. And I remind gentlemen that our experience is but another illustration of the danger of importing more than we export, and the consequent drainage of money from the country.

Again, I invite attention to a matter of common knowledge, and that is that in every considerable village or city in the North and West where there are enterprising men substantial inducements are being held out to attract manufacturing industries, and that wherever these industries go they are followed by increased prosperity not only for the city or village but for the surrounding country, for they attract population, bring the consumer and the producer nearer together, lessen cost of transportation, make a market for a large class of farm products that would otherwise be valueless and which not infrequently determines the question of profit or loss in farming.

Go to any little village which for twenty years has not increased beyond a hundred inhabitants, whose business is represented by a store, a blacksmith shop, and a corner grocery. Start a tile factory or sink a coal shaft, something to make use of nature's wealth and give employment to labor, and in two or three years the little village has grown to a thousand inhabitants with a thousand mouths to be fed, and a new farm market has been built up.

Mr. PETTIBONE. And eggs are selling higher.

Mr. ROWELL. Yes; eggs are selling higher. They have increased from 3 cents to 12½ cents per dozen—no small item, for according to the last census report the egg product of the country was worth $55,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what does all this mean? It means that in this country the Almighty has planted wealth under the hills and under the prairies! It means that our whole country is a vast field of agricultural wealth! It means that we possess almost everything within our borders necessary to a nation's happiness, its prosperity, and its growth in wealth and intelligence.

What does free trade with other countries mean? It means that the coal shall continue to slumber in its bed; that the iron ore shall be left where it was planted; that the water which ought to turn the factory wheels shall go on unused to the ocean; it means that because under other systems of government, with other hopes and aspirations, men have learned to live cheaper; to have fewer wants and to expect to end their lives in the workhouse. We must conform to their methods and teach our people to live as they live and endure as they endure, so that the rich may remain rich and the poor may be always poor, and remain always with us.

If cheapness and unrestricted competition is what we are after let us take down the bars against Chinese emigration. Let every workhouse in Europe open its doors and pour upon us its poverty-stricken inmates, so that we may have the cheapest of cheap labor.

For one, I am unwilling that America shall conform its system of government to that of any of the nations of any continent. I am unwilling that Old World methods which have hardened humanity, which have crushed out hope, shall be transplanted here. Here we have fifty-five million people to compete with each other and not a slave among them. Here all are equal before the law, and all avenues of preferment are open to the rich and the poor, the high and the low alike. It would seem that here is sharp enough competition to keep profits within the bounds of reasonableness and to make a fair distribution of the good things and the burdens among all the people, and that to open up our ports to the untaxed entry of foreign products such as can be equally well produced here is unfair competition, a world-wide competition, which must in the end compel a readjustment of our methods of life, which will leave us all the burdens and transfer to other countries a large share of the good things which are ours by right of our fortunate position, our magnificent country, our intelligent population, and our liberal laws.

It is this home competition which regulates prices, whether of home or foreign products consumed here. It is unequal competition with all the world that in the end destroys our own industries, our own competition, and eventually enhances cost to the consumer. The conclusion is irresistible; under our present system of tariff duties foreign producers pay the largest share of the expense of our Government, and to that extent relieve our own people of the burden, so that our tariff instead of being a tax upon the people is a release from taxation, and the passage of this bill will not only not relieve the people of the burdens of taxation but will inevitably increase them.

We hear a great deal about monopolists in this debate. A man who happens to own a coal bank or an iron mine or a factory and has means to employ labor is in the Democratic vocabulary a monopolist, and to get rid of the evil we must cease to have employers in this country, so that we may have the privilege of buying from the monopolists of other countries. We must have no employers, for then we shall have something to sell and somebody to buy, somebody besides the food-producers, and it might interfere with our ability to furnish Europe with cheap food in exchange for her cheap manufactures.

We are continually told how prosperous we were under Democratic revenue tariff, and how our prosperity has departed under the present duties. Have gentlemen been sleeping a Rip Van Winkle sleep for the last twenty years, are they still asleep, and unmindful of the rapid strides we have made as a nation? Are they unmindful of the fact that in that time we have fought through a war unparalleled for its destruction of property; that we have recovered from its losses; that we have attained to a national credit scarcely equaled by the oldest and richest nations; that we have reclaimed an empire in the Northwest and West and dotted it all over with prosperous homes; that cities have sprung up as if by magic, and that the seaboard has ceased to be the center and home of our manufactures?

Have you kept your eyes closed in your travels over our broad country? Whether we study the census reports or make use of common knowledge, from the utter collapse of business and threatened universal bankruptcy in a time of profound peace in 1860, as a result of Democratic policies now sought to be restored by this bill, we have risen above our misfortunes until we are the marvel of the world. And we are not likely ever to return to those simple habits which belonged to a new country when all were farmers and planters.

The hum of the factory and the smoke of the furnace will continue to fret the Democratic heart while they add to the general wealth and increase the means of happiness among all the people, no matter how earnestly we are bid to return to the good old days of the fathers. One other thing we are told, that the laboring man demands and requires this reduction of tariff. Do you know any place in this country where associated labor is clamoring for free trade? Do you not know that you are trembling at the possible issue of your attempt to pass this bill because the great army of laboring men, knowing better than you their needs and wants, and knowing as you ought to know that the passage of this bill will send many of them out of employment, can not by any party ties be forced to vote against their own interests? You say it is the manufacturers and monopolists who are demanding protection. I say to you that wherever in this country there is a labor organization of intelligent men, men educated in the free schools of America, men who read and understand, who have libraries in their houses, wherever you find associations of men of this character you will find a standing menace against Democracy if you go into the campaign with the Morrison bill for an issue. You can not go before the people and say that this bill does not mean eventual free trade, that it simply makes a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent., retaining the adjustments which Republicans made, because you have declared that this bill is but the beginning. You have said, "Send us back to power and we will make further reductions and changes; keep us in power long enough and we will wipe out all barriers which stand between us and free competition in the world's markets." The issue is made up; by it you must stand or fall. This debate is but the beginning of that wider discussion, which will not stop until it has reached every voter in this land and culminated in a decision at the ballot-box. On our side we welcome the issue and await with confidence the final verdict.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I propose to speak some five or ten minutes to-night, hoping to have the opportunity to finish my remarks on some other evening. I propose, in the course of the hour allotted to me, to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. ROWELL] and my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] that this bill, although it is not the bill that I desire, will increase the demand for labor and increase the price of labor; that it will protect labor.

I propose to demonstrate this by an argument which you can not resist or controvert. I propose further to demonstrate that a properly adjusted tariff (and I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat that there will be another tariff bill, another reduction)—I propose to demonstrate that a properly adjusted tariff in this country, one that will give happiness, peace, prosperity, equal rights, and equal privileges to all, is that tariff which levies such duties as are needed to furnish revenues for the support of the Government; and I do not mean a niggardly support of a great Government like this, but support of the Government in the fullest, fairest sense of the term. I mean, sir, to build up our navies; I mean to build up our fortifications; I mean to have money enough in the Treasury of this country to do all this and enough besides to pay our debts. Do gentlemen object to that? Do gentlemen who oppose this bill say that we never ought to pay these debts?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. We do not say that.

Mr. WOLFORD. Then why do you object to getting more money into the Treasury? If that is the result of the bill, what objection can there be? I believe that there will be sense enough in the American people to vote for those who support this measure if its effect should be, as I hope it will, to get a little more money into the Treasury. I am not afraid of that. More money in the Treasury—you say the bill will bring more money into the Treasury. I repeat the hope that it will.

I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. ROWELL] that it will bless the country by bringing more money into the Treasury, although we look at the question from different standpoints. Do you think the Democratic party of this country is opposed to having more money? They think it will go into the Treasury, and they expect to come into power in this country, and when they come into power they will have prudence enough and sense enough not to squander it or waste it upon every corruption like the Republicans have done. You believe they will not take care of the Treasury of this country as in times of old. But I tell you that there is no fear of a little more money in the Treasury as long as it is in the hands of the Democratic party. I would object to it myself if you had the charge of it. But you will not have it.

But do you know, gentlemen, what the amount of the debt is? You tell me that it is $1,400,000,000. That is a large amount of money, but that is not the amount of the debt. Where are your hundreds of millions to meet the payment of your pensions every year? Where is the debt you owe the Indians? Where is the money to meet the tens of thousands of debts of all kinds over the country that you have not yet had audited—debts created by the war, but which will be paid and should be paid? Claim after claim will come, several hundred thousands of claims which have not yet been allowed, and expenditures of every kind that must be met, and I make the assertion, and I defy any man of reasonable sense to contradict it, that before you get through with it the debt will amount to $2,000,000,000. That is a great debt and you have got to met it, and are gentlemen a little afraid lest we will get too much money in the Treasury? Then, in addition to what I have said, you have got to educate the children of this country. There is a bill passed by the Senate to aid the States in the education of the children of the country.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You are talking like a Republican now.

Mr. WOLFORD. Well, if the Republicans would talk that way and act that way we would soon get clear of all difficulties. [Laughter.] But I say there is a bill for that purpose.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That bill has passed the Senate, has it not?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, and it will come to this House, and I hope you will vote for it.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Of course I will. It came from the Republican Senate.

Mr. WOLFORD. I do not care where it came from; it is a good bill, and I hope you will support it. You will find that the Democrats are willing to spend money when they get it under their control, and they will spend it wisely and honestly, and the Democrats are not afraid to have too much money in the Treasury so long as they control it. They have no objection whatever to its being there. Now I want to talk on this subject for a very few moments, then I will yield to a motion that the committee rise, and conclude my speech hereafter. I say, sir, that the Democrats might be a little afraid to trust you Republicans with it, but they will not be afraid to trust themselves. They do not object to that; but I will tell you what they do object to and what the heart and soul of the whole of the freemen of free America object to. They do object to what you call protection. They want to strip it of its falsehood and fraud; and they object under the name of protection to parties that need no protection laying a heavy tax upon them. That is what they object to and protest against.

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman now yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Go on for twenty or twenty-five minutes longer.

Mr. WOLFORD. I will give way; and if you will come here on Saturday I will convince you of your folly. I will yield for the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. MORRISON. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. ADAMS, of New York, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COSGROVE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 10 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BLAND: Petition for an appropriation of $1,000 for survey, &c., of Osage Run from mouth to Linn Creek, Missouri—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. JOHN WINANS: Petition of William P. Bently and 210 others, of Wisconsin, for adequate protection to American growers of tobacco against the pauper labor of foreign countries—to the same committee.

By Mr. YAPLE: Petition of George Buck, Theodore Merrill, John Galligan, and others, citizens of Kalamazoo, Mich., for the establishment of a branch of the National Soldiers' Home in Michigan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 25, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. G. J. LUCKEY, of Peoria, Ill.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature to the following enrolled bill, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (H. R. 6538) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter of the Chief of Engineers, submitting reports of Maj. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, of the examination and survey of the Passaic River between Passaic and Paterson, in the State of New Jersey, made in compliance with the requirements of the river and harbor act of August 2, 1882; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the naval appropriation bill, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with a message concerning the Senate amendments. The message of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House concur in the forty-first amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and non-concur in the residue of the amendments of the Senate to said bill.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House and ask for a conference.

I wish to say that the action of the House upon the naval appropriation bill and upon the amendments which were sent to it by this body has been to reject all of them with the exception of the amendment providing for the armament of the steel cruisers now building. The Senate put on an amendment covering that to the amount of $500,000, and after controversy in the House that body agreed to that amendment upon the yeas and nays by a considerable majority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks reference to the proceedings of the House is not in order.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose at all to discuss the proceedings of the other House. The amendments that the Senate put on, covering the important features of additional cruisers, for going on with the completion of the ironclads, the monitors, for fitting up a navy-yard or navy-yards in order that they may be enabled to compete with private builders, the provisions for additional guns and armament for the Navy generally, and the provision reviving the gun-foundery board, have all been rejected.

Therefore, that these matters may be brought between the two Houses to a conference, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House and ask for a conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate insist on its amendments non-concurred in by the House of Representatives and ask for a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. HALE. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3931) to create an additional United States judicial district, and to establish circuit and district courts therein in the State of Alabama.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented resolutions adopted by W. H. Deering Post, No. 247, Grand Army of the Republic, of Antwerp, Ohio, favoring such legislation as is recommended by the pension committee of that organization in regard to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LAPHAM presented resolutions of the assembly of the Legislature of New York; which were referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY, Albany, April 11, 1884.

Whereas the incentive and rewards given to inventors, by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress passed thereunder, have done more, perhaps, than any one cause to advance our whole country to the front rank in wealth, resources, and industries among all nations of the world; and

Whereas any material change in those laws would, in the opinion of this House, seriously retard our progress as a people: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress are respectfully requested to approve the passage of any bill which would have the effect to discourage inventions by impairing the value of patented property, or of imposing any conditions on the owners of such property in prosecuting and maintaining their rights to the full value of their said property, which are not equally applicable under the laws of Congress to the rights of all property, and the remedies provided to protect the same, for all citizens of our entire country.

Resolved, That this House heartily approves of such amendments to existing patent laws as shall provide speedy and full punishment for all persons who appropriate the patented property of others without authority of law, and manufacture and sell the same to innocent purchasers and users thereof, to the great annoyance in some cases of the user, and to the great injury of the rightful owner of such property in all cases.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each Senator and Representative in Congress.

By order:

C. A. CHICKERING, Clerk.

Mr. LAPHAM presented resolutions of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, remonstrating against the proposed reduction of the lifetime of a patent from seventeen to five years; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Albany, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the House bill providing for the construction of a bridge over the Hudson River, known as the "Storm King" bridge; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Buffalo Merchants' Exchange, in favor of the passage of an act to suspend the coinage of silver dollars at this session, or to repeal the act under which they are coined; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York, urging the necessary appropriation for the establishment of a gun-factory under the control of the Government at Watervliet arsenal at West Troy, N. Y.; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of Buffalo, N. Y., in favor of an appropriation for the support of the Signal Service; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions of the executive committee of the Civil Service Reform Association of Missouri, approving the resolution of the National Civil Service Reform League that Congress should repeal the law by which the tenure of administrative offices are fixed at four years; which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Albany, N. Y., urging the passage of the bill (H. R. 3538) for the improvement of the Erie Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, in favor of the passage of House bill No. 5892, known as the Dingley pilotage bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, urging the further improvement of Buttermilk Channel by the removal of the remainder of the shoal between Governor's Island and the Brooklyn shore in the State of New York; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of Grover Post, No. 98, Grand Army of the Republic, of Cortland, N. Y., in favor of the passage of a bill to pension all veterans; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union prisoners of war, citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, praying Congress to award each prisoner of war such measure of relief as is just and equitable; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions of E. D. Holt Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Fredonia, N. Y., resolutions of Cross Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Seneca Falls, N. Y., resolutions of Grand Army of the Republic Post, Ithica, N. Y., resolutions of Gould Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Phœnix, N. Y., resolutions of Henry Wilson Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Slatersville, N. Y., resolutions of Ratcliff Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New York, and resolutions of the Grand Army of the Republic Post of Kings County, New York, urging early action by Congress upon the recommendation of the national committee on pensions of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER presented resolutions of the Albert Nye Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Romeo, Mich., in favor of such legislation on the subject of pensions as is recommended by the general committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a memorial of the Terry Clock Company and 17 other manufacturers and inventors of Pittsfield, Mass., and the memorial of Barnum & Root, manufacturers, of Connecticut, remonstrating against the repeal or hostile modification of the present patent laws; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SAWYER presented the petition of H. O. Watrous Post, No. 93, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for an increase of pensions to ex-Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1339) granting a pension to Frank Gray, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1572) to encourage Indian education in the Territory of Dakota, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2042) to protect American laborers, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BLAIR. I am directed by the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1340) to establish and maintain a bureau of labor statistics, to report it without amendment. I give notice that at an early day I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1484) to provide for the study of physiology, and the effect of intoxicating, narcotic, and poisonous substances upon life, health, and welfare, by the pupils in the public schools of the Territories and the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

ACTING SECRETARY OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Joint Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2093) to provide for the appointment of an acting secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to report it without amendment; and as this is a matter of formal administration I ask that it be acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution may, by an instrument in writing filed in the office of the Secretary thereof, designate and appoint a suitable person to act as Secretary of the institution when there shall be a vacancy in said office, and whenever the Secretary shall be unable from illness, absence, or other cause to perform the duties of his office; and in such case the person so appointed may perform all the duties imposed on the Secretary by law until the vacancy shall be filled or such inability shall cease. The said Chancellor may change such designation and appointment from time to time as the interests of the institution may in his judgment require.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some reasons for the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the ordinary provision made to provide for the absence of Professor Baird. Professor Baird may sometimes be absent, and this provision is substantially similar to what is provided for other offices and Departments of the Government, to fill the duties of the office during his absence or disability or inability.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not to supplant him in any way?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I believe it was recommended by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Secretary, the Chair understands.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the request of the Secretary. It is to provide for a contingency common in other Departments of the Government.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN SILK FLAG.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the Joint Committee on the Library to report back a resolution submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] and to recommend its passage. As it is a very brief matter, I ask for its present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the silk flag presented by Mr. Joseph Neumann, of California, to the Senate and accepted by the Senate on the 12th day of July, 1870, the said flag being, it is believed, the first American flag made of American silk, be deposited in the Smithsonian Institution for exhibition and preservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not the slightest objection to the resolution, but I wish merely to put on record my grave doubt as to whether that is the first native American flag. It is my duty as a representative of the Connecticut manufacturers to say that.

Mr. SHERMAN. We do not say that it is the first by adopting the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (S. 2104) to authorize the sale of certain public lands to the Arizona Mineral Belt Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 2105) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Passed Assistant Engineer Nathan B. Clark a chief engineer on the retired-list of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to L. V. Hollyfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2107) granting a pension to John A. Shuckers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2108) granting a pension to Adam Stuber; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2109) granting a pension to John Galloup; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2110) to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2111) for the relief of Eugene V. Layraft; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MADISON FEMALE INSTITUTE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII. The first bill on the Calendar will now be reported.

The bill (S. 1130) for the relief of the Madison Female Institute, located at Richmond, Ky., was announced as first in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. The other day I asked that that bill might lie over for a day or two, until I could receive more accurate information from the Department. The committee proceeded upon the idea that $10,000 had been paid, and the Department advised me that more had been paid. I ask the chairman of the committee if he objects, and if there is no objection I should like to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Claims for further examination.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM PERINE.

The bill (S. 1240) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. I promised the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] who is now absent from the Senate that I would ask that that bill be not considered during his absence. If the Senator having it in charge will allow it to lie over in its place on the Calendar until the return of the Senator from Connecticut, I have no objection to its taking that course. If the Senator is not willing for it to take that course, I shall be forced to object to its consideration; but I have no desire to object if it is agreeable to the Senator having the bill in charge to let it lie over in its place on the Calendar until the return of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PIKE. I dare say the Senator from Connecticut changed his mind, for he told me that he did not desire to have action delayed on the bill if he should not be present when it came up again. However, I presume he spoke to the Senator from Tennessee afterward. I consent that the bill may go over, retaining its place at the head of the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill being passed over, retaining its place at the head of the Calendar, until the Senator from Connecticut shall return, or a reasonable time? The Chair puts it in that form in order that the bill may not be called to-morrow, to save the time of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. There was another case where the Senator from Connecticut made a similar request. Is the Senator from Tennessee sure that he also desired this bill to go over?

Mr. HARRIS. I am not confounding the two cases. I understood the Senator from Connecticut. He made a distinct request of the Senate that another bill, which will be reached later, should not be considered during his absence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee that Order of Business 260 be passed over, retaining its place until the return of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RUDOLPH LESCHOT'S PATENT.

Mr. HOAR. I shall have to be absent from the Senate for a little while, and I ask unanimous consent that a like order be made in regard to Order of Business 270, the bill (S. 419) for the extension of letters patent to the heirs of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, which is a case in charge of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. He desired me to make the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill named by him be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is, that it retain its place and be not objected to when reached to-day on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MARTIN KENOFSKY.

The consideration of the bill (S. 1596) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read on a former occasion, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] moved, or gave notice of his intention to move, to refer the bill to the Court of Claims, and the Chair asked him to reduce his motion to writing in order that it might conform to the statute and the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. On further consideration of that matter and on consultation with the Senator who reported the bill and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS], I have made up my mind that I shall not submit the motion I indicated at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be withdrawn, and the bill open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The bill (S. 1597) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture was announced as next in order.

Mr. KENNA. Shortly after the bill was reported I gave notice of a desire to offer a substitute for the bill. The substitute by permission of the Senate was printed. I should like, if there be no objection, that the substitute may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia now offer the substitute as an amendment?

Mr. KENNA. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That there shall be at the seat of Government an Executive Department to be known as the department of industries, and a secretary of industries, who shall be the head thereof.

SEC. 2. That there shall in the department of industries a division of agriculture, and to superintend said division a commissioner of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, and who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be entitled to receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of collecting and disseminating all important and useful information concerning agriculture, and also concerning such scientific matters and industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture, the secretary of industries shall organize the following bureaus in the division of agriculture, namely:

First. The bureau of agricultural products, which shall include divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry, and the chief of which bureau, who shall be a practical agriculturist, shall investigate the modes of farming in the several States and Territories, and shall report such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farmer respecting the various methods, the crops most profitable in the several sections, the preferable varieties of seeds, vines, plants, and fruits, fertilizers, implements, buildings, and similar matters.

Second. The bureau of animal industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection, growth, and use, the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases, and the kinds, races, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

Third. The bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, &c., are hereby transferred to the department of industries. And the secretary of industries shall institute such investigations and collect and report such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States, and facilities for their ventilation and general operation, as may be deemed of value and importance.

SEC. 4. That in addition to the duties imposed by chapter 10, title 7, of the Revised Statutes, the secretary of industries shall cause to be collected and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and also all important information and statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to labor, and demands and prices therefor, in this and other countries; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live-stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, cost of transportation, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau and to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers, miners, mechanics, laborers, or other industrialists of the United States.

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of commerce, and to superintend said division a commissioner of commerce, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 6. That all divisions and subdivisions, bureaus or parts thereof, heretofore attaching to the Treasury Department by virtue of the provisions of chapter 10 of title 7 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Bureau of Statistics, which shall hereafter be known as the bureau of external commerce; title 48, relating to commerce and navigation; title 49, relating to the regulation of vessels in foreign commerce; title 50, relating to the regulation of vessels in domestic commerce; title 52, relating to the regulation of steam-vessels; title 56, relating to the Coast Survey; title 55, relating to lights and buoys; sections 4801, 4802, 4803, 4804, 4805, 4806, of chapter 1, title 59, relating to hospital relief for seamen; and chapter 265 of the acts of the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, relating to the Life-Saving Service, or by virtue of any law amendatory of said several provisions, or regulations in pursuance thereof, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be parts of the division of commerce in the department of industries; and the secretary of industries shall establish in said division of commerce a bureau of internal commerce, to be organized and governed as other bureaus in said division.

SEC. 7. That all duties devolving upon the Secretary of the Treasury by virtue of the several provisions mentioned in the preceding section shall, from and after the passage of this act, be performed by the secretary of industries. The authority conferred and the duties imposed by said several provisions upon the register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be exercised and discharged by the commissioner of commerce. All bonds authorized by any of the provisions aforesaid to be made payable to the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be made payable to the commissioner of commerce.

SEC. 8. That section 158, title 4 of the Revised Statutes, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"Eighth. The department of industries."

SEC. 9. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with the present organization of the various departments, divisions, subdivisions, and bureaus embraced herein, except with reference to the transfer thereof to the department of industries, subject to the general provisions of law relating to regulations in the various Departments of the Government and appointments to office therein.

SEC. 10. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the paper which has been read is intended as a substitute for the entire bill. It is a very complicated measure in many sections, and it is quite impossible for it to be disposed of under the five-minute rule. The question of enlarging a department of this Government is not going to be passed upon lightly. The creation of a new Cabinet officer with all the detail of duty that is necessarily implied, is a thing of very grave consideration.

I take it for granted that the proposed substitute will be printed in the RECORD, and that it may be examined and understood I shall object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The Senator from Delaware objects to the present consideration of the bill under Rule VIII. The Chief Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

UMATILLA RIVER WATER-RIGHT.

The bill (S. 938) confirming to W. S. Byers & Co. the right to take and use water from the Umatilla River, on the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, for manufacturing and other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certain amendments are reported by the committee which will be announced.

Mr. MORGAN. From what committee does the bill come?

The PRESIDING OFFICER The Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

Mr. SLATER. There is a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Report No. 208.

Mr. MORGAN. I supposed from the length of the preamble and the recitals in it that perhaps the preamble stood for a report. I did not know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee reports in favor of striking out the preamble. Does the Senator desire that the report be read?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SLATER February 20, 1884:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 938) confirming to W. S. Byers & Co. the right to take and use water from the Umatilla River, on the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, for manufacturing and other purposes, report:

That in July, 1870, permission was given by the Indian Bureau to certain parties in the town of Pendleton to take water from the Umatilla River, on the Umatilla Indian reservation, in the State of Oregon, and convey the same to the town of Pendleton "for irrigating, manufacturing, and milling purposes;" that a ditch was constructed and water conveyed to said town, a distance of something like a mile or more.

That subsequently W. S. Byers acquired the right of said water and constructed a mill at the town of Pendleton, for the manufacture of flour. That the said Byers and those who have since been associated with him in said mill have expended a large sum of money in the improvement of said mill and the addition from time to time of new and improved machinery, until the property is now valued at about $100,000. That the machinery of said mill is adapted only to the use of water as a motive power, and without the water-power, derived as stated, the said mill and property would be practically useless and become nearly a total loss to said company.

The facts and circumstances connected with the permission to take water from the Umatilla River is clearly and forcibly stated by Hon. H. Price, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Interior of date January 31, 1884, in which he says:

"The records of this office show that under date of April 23, 1870, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for Oregon, Col. A. B. Meacham, transmitted a petition signed by George A. La Dow, F. Coots, Lot Livermore, O. T. Thompson, and George W. Bailey, citizens of Pendleton, Oreg., praying for permission to construct a water ditch across a portion of said reservation (Umatilla) to the town of Pendleton for irrigating, manufacturing, and milling purposes. Colonel Meacham recommended the granting of the petition, and accordingly, by letter dated May 18, 1870, he was authorized by this office to grant the privileges asked for if it could be done without injury or detriment to the Indians or their property; and upon the express condition that no permanent rights should attach or become vested, and that any ditch or canal dug or constructed, and the use of the same, should be subject to the control of and to be discontinued at the pleasure of the Department.

"In pursuance of this authority, Agent Boyle, the then agent at the Umatilla agency, gave written permission to the parties to construct the ditch. His letter, a copy of which is on file in this office, is dated July 7, 1870. It recites the conditions imposed by this office as follows:

"In granting this permission to construct the water-ditch it is upon the express condition that no permanent right shall attach or become vested, but that any ditch or canal dug or constructed, and the use of the same, shall be subject to the control of and to be discontinued at the pleasure of the Department.

"On the strength of the authority thus given a very large sum of money has been expended by Byers & Co. in the construction of a flour and grist mill, and the purchase of machinery therefor.

"The ditch has been in constant use since its construction, and the privilege has been of untold benefit to the people of Pendleton and surrounding country, and of no little service to the Indians themselves. I believe the right should be confirmed to Byers & Co., and I so recommend. No damages can result to the Indians thereby."

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended in line 13 by striking out the words "and other."

Amend also by striking out, after the word "assigns," to the end of the bill, and add as follows: "This act shall in no way impair or affect any existing right to a reasonable use of the water of said stream for agricultural purposes."

Amend also by striking out the preamble.

And when so amended your committee recommend that the same be passed.

Mr. HARRISON. The case, according to the report, seems to be this: In 1870, under a license granted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, these parties constructed a ditch to take water from a stream somewhere on the Umatilla reservation, the ditch being something like one mile in length. They paid nothing for the right to the Indians or anybody else. It was expressly stipulated in the grant that it was a mere license revocable at the pleasure of the Indian Department. It seems they have gone on and constructed a mill and are using this water-right, which I should conclude to be a very valuable one, taking the water not at a point where they have any riparian rights at all, but where if there are any riparian rights they belong to the Indians.

It is not clear by the report whether the point at which the water is taken from the stream is within the reservation as now reduced under recent legislation, but if it is it seems to me there is no reason why a valuable water-right, as this evidently is, should be confirmed to these gentlemen without the payment of a dollar to anybody. The bill is an absolute confirmation of their title, so far as the Government can confirm it, for all future time, when they have paid no consideration for it to any one. It is intended to give them an exclusive right to a large body of water which may be valuable for other purposes, and to which other people may have some right, so far as I know from the report; and I do not think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. SLATER. The right attaches just over the line on the territory of the Indian reservation, probably not more than from forty to one hundred rods within the Indian reservation. The ditch itself follows down through the land that was intended to be sold for town purposes by a bill passed during the last Congress; and there are only about forty acres that are affected at all by this water-right. The Indians have had a very large advantage already from the construction of this mill, and the whole surrounding country is interested in the continuance of the mill. It is true this water-right has become valuable, but only by the money of these investors, W. C. Byers & Co., and I think that to ask them to pay for what they have really created by the investment of their capital after they have shown the value of the privilege in this way is making a very considerable claim upon them. They ought not to be asked now to submit to any exaction of this character.

The Indian Bureau, understanding the question perfectly well, do not think any compensation should be asked as long as it stands in this way. They have already been compelled to pay very large sums of money by parties who claimed rights adjacent, I think some six or seven thousand dollars, in order to settle their rights and draw things down to a point where nothing would intervene between them and a perfect title except the permission of the Department, which this bill seeks to confirm. It would be an act of injustice to these people not to confirm their right, the result of which would be to place them in a position to be blackmailed, rendering their property insecure and causing a very great depreciation.

Not only that, but the Indians themselves are personally interested in the continuance of this mill, which will furnish them a market for whatever they have to sell. It furnishes them means of procuring flour; and it is the only point within forty miles where they can procure flour. The whole country there is interested in this property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs will be read.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs were, in line 13, after the word "manufacturing," to strike out "and other;" in line 16, after the word "assigns," to strike out "and each of said parties shall take and become seized of the rights herein confirmed in the ratio of his interest held and owned in the said firm of W. S. Byers and Company," and insert "this act shall in no way impair or affect any existing right to a reasonable use of the water of said stream for agricultural purposes;" so as to read:

That the right of W. S. Byers, Robert G. Thompson, and Jeremiah Barnhart, now constituting the firm of W. S. Byers & Co., of the town of Pendleton, in the State of Oregon, to take water from the Umatilla River at a point on the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 1, in township 2 north, range 32 east of the Willamette meridian, on the Umatilla reservation, in the said State, in the manner and to the extent heretofore and now taken by the said Byers & Co., and to convey the same, by means of a ditch, race, or otherwise, to the mill of said company in the town of Pendleton, for manufacturing purposes, together with the right of way for said ditch or race as at present constructed through and over lands of the said reservation, is hereby confirmed to them, their heirs and assigns. This act shall in no way impair or affect any existing right to a reasonable use of the water of said stream for agricultural purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 10, after the word "and," I move to strike out "now" and insert "on January 1, 1884;" and then in line 14, I move to strike out "at present," and after the word "constructed," in line 15, to insert "on said January 1, 1884," so as to confine them to the use and privileges they had on January 1, 1884, and not what they may have put in after the introduction and pendency of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I restrict them to the use they had made prior to and on January 1, 1884, and not to extend to any subsequent use they might acquire.

Mr. SLATER. I shall make no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to strike out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. The title should be amended by striking out "and other." As the bill limits the use of the water to manufacturing purposes the words "and other" in the title ought to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves to amend the title by striking out the words "and other" before "purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

C. M. WILCOX.

The bill (S. 139) for the relief of C. M. Wilcox was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is adversely reported.

Mr. COKE. I see that this bill has been adversely reported. I understand that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY], who is now absent in Texas, made a minority report. I ask that the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, until his return.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Z. M. PETTIGREW.

The bill (S. 566) for the relief of Z. M. Pettigrew was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "thousand," to strike out "$722.50" and insert "$100;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Z. M. Pettigrew, late postmaster at Eureka Springs, Ark., $1,100, in full compensation for the moneys paid by said Pettigrew for clerk-hire in the post-office, and for the ordinary expenses of said office.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear the report.

Mr. WILSON. There is a report accompanying the bill. I ask that the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WILSON February 21, 1884:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 566) for the relief of Z. M. Pettigrew, having duly considered the same, submit the following report:

The committee called on the Post-Office Department for the facts in the case, and for its opinion concerning the same. The First Assistant Postmaster-General in a letter dated February 13, 1884, gave the following response:

"In reply I herewith inclose the petition and vouchers submitted by the said Pettigrew, through Hon. S. B. MAXEY, under date of January 23, 1882, and have to request that the said petition and letter be returned to this office at your convenience, as they form part of the records of the Department.

"For your further information I append herewith copies of reports made by Inspector M. La Rue Harrison, under date of May 13, 1881, relative to the needs and importance of the Eureka Springs post-office.

"Upon the report of Inspector Harrison an allowance of $600 a year for clerical assistance in separating the mails was made, to take effect from July 1, 1881, and under section 125, Postal Laws and Regulations, 1879, an additional allowance of $900 for temporary clerical assistance, to be distributed as recommended in said report, was made, making a total of $1,500 a year for clerk-hire. But the records of the Department show that the said Pettigrew was appointed postmaster January 15, 1880, and that his successor was appointed June 29, 1881; therefore the allowance mentioned above did not afford any relief to the said Pettigrew.

"Under the operation of the act of July 12, 1876 (section 117, Postal Laws and Regulations, 1879), the compensation of the postmaster at Eureka Springs was limited to $250 a quarter, exclusive of money-order commissions, during the incumbency of the said Pettigrew; but upon a report received by this office September 8, 1881, from the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, the returns from the Eureka Springs office for the four quarters ending June 30, 1881, were reviewed, and, in accordance with the requirements of section 116, Postal Laws and Regulation, 1879, the salary of the postmaster was fixed at $1,600 a year from October 1, 1881.

"The reports for the period named above show the receipts of the office to have been as follows:

Quarter ended September 30, 1880	$795 28
Quarter ended December 31, 1880	879 83
Quarter ended March 31, 1881	1,386 90
Quarter ended June 30, 1881	1,896 89
Total	4,958 90

"From the statement herein made, it will be seen that Mr. Pettigrew's successor secured the benefit of the adjustment of salary and the allowance for clerk-hire, as made to take effect July 1, 1881; and that the said Pettigrew did not receive any remuneration other than his compensation as a fourth-class postmaster.

"It also appears that Mr. Pettigrew made frequent applications for an allowance for clerk-hire, and that his requests were declined, for the reason that the limited appropriation for clerks in post-offices at the disposal of the Department would not warrant favorable action in his case.

"That part of the claim for rent, fuel, and light could not have been allowed, as there is no authority in law by which allowance for the purposes named could be made at an office of the fourth class, to which class the office at Eureka Springs belonged at that time.

"In conclusion, I have no hesitancy in recommending that relief be granted in the form of a reasonable sum to reimburse Mr. Pettigrew for the amounts expended for clerk-hire during his incumbency as postmaster at Eureka Springs, Ark."

The claim presented by Mr. Pettigrew is shown by the papers in the case to be as follows:

Schedule of expenses incurred and paid by Z. M. Pettigrew in conducting the post-office at Eureka Springs, Ark., from July 8, 1880, to March 31, 1881, inclusive.

Clerk-hire, as per voucher	$1,410 00
Office-rent, as per voucher	270 00
Fire-wood, as per voucher	35 00
Coal-oil for light, as per voucher	7 50
	1,722 50

This statement is sworn to by Mr. Pettigrew, and the vouchers covering the amounts paid for clerk-hire are sworn to by the parties to whom the money was paid.

As there was no law under which the Department could have made an allowance for rent, fuel, and light to the postmaster at Eureka Springs, the committee reject so much of the claim as covers expenditures for those items and recommend an allowance of $1,100 on account of money expended for clerk-hire. This will be at the rate of $1,500 a year for the time that Mr. Pettigrew held the position of postmaster and in harmony with the allowance made to said office by the Department.

The committee therefore report back the said bill with an amendment reducing the amount named in it to $1,100, recommending the adoption of the same and the passage of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. RANDLE.

The bill (S. 1482) for the relief of William H. Randle, of Nashville, Tenn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William H. Randle of $400, on account of the loss of a registered letter containing $400 by reason of a defective postal car, which sum was paid by Randle immediately after the loss of the letter.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WARD B. BURNETT.

The bill (S. 1388) to increase the pensionof General Ward B. Burnett was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over. There is an adverse report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MISSOURI HOME GUARDS.

The bill (S. 1518) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates of discharge to certain members of the Missouri Home Guards was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that part of the report be read in the case.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. COCKRELL February 5, 1884, and read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1518) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates of discharge to certain members of the Missouri Home Guards, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

On February 12, 1884, the Adjutant-General of the United States Army addressed to Mr. COCKRELL, of your committee, a letter as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 12, 1884.

SIR: As numerous applications have been received at this office for discharges from service in the cases of members of the Missouri Home Guards, whose claims for pay were adjudicated by the Hawkins Taylor Commission, under the act of March 25, 1862, and the several acts supplementary thereto, and as no speeific authority of law is vested in the Department to grant these requests, the act referred to providing only for pay, bounty, and pension, I have the honor to invite your attention to the matter, with a view to such action as may be deemed just and proper, and to inclose herewith for your consideration the rough draught of a bill which it is thought will remedy any defect in existing laws on this subject.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL, on February 13, 1884, presented the bill inclosed to him in the foregoing letter, and the same (S. 1518) was referred to your committee.

On the 28th of January, 1882, Mr. COCKRELL addressed a letter of inquiry in regard to the Hawkins Taylor Commission to the Secretary of War, and received the following in reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, February 11, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 28th ultimo, asking whether the Hawkins Taylor Commission, appointed under act of March 25, 1862, to visit the State of Missouri to adjust the claims of the "Home Guards," included in their action claims of the "Enrolled Missouri Militia," and, also, whether the same has been printed, and what action taken thereon, I have the honor to invite your attention to the inclosed report of the Adjutant-General of the Army concerning the subject-matter of inquiry.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 7, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the letter of Hon. F. M. COCKRELL, United States Senator, in which he requests to be informed whether or not the commission appointed by the President (known as the Hawkins Taylor commission) to examine all claims arising under the provisions of the act approved March 25, 1862, audited or considered claims of the "Enrolled Missouri Militia;" also, whether the report of the commission has been printed, and what action has been taken on said report, and in reply to report that under the act approved March 25, 1862, the Secretary of War was authorized to allow pay, bounty, and pension to the officers and men actually employed in the military service of the United States prior to March 25, 1862, in the western department, or department of Missouri.

By joint resolution approved July 12, 1862, all payments under the act of March 25, 1862, were suspended, and the President was authorized to appoint three commissioners to examine all claims arising under the act before referred to, and report the same to the Secretary of War within sixty days after the passage of the resolution.

The commissioners appointed by the President under the joint resolution referred to were Hawkins Taylor, esq., of ——, Charles T. Sherman, esq., of Ohio, and Francis T. Russell, esq., of Missouri.

By the joint resolution approved February 16, 1863, the provisions of the joint resolution of July 12, 1862, were revived so as to allow the commissioners six months after the 16th of February, 1863, within which to make their report.

The commission, under the law, could and did only allow claims for pay (personal-service pay), bounty, and pension for service rendered prior to March 25, 1862, date of approval of the act authorizing payment.

The commission allowed the claims of such organizations only as were called into service by special authority of the commanding generals of the departments, or under a general invitation from them to form home guards, and which performed actual military service in the field under such calls.

The claims for pay and bounty allowed by the commission were paid at Saint Louis, Mo., by officers of the Pay Department of the Army especially designated for that duty.

The claims for pension allowed by the commission were to be settled by the Interior Department and entered on the regular pension-lists.

The original manuscript report of the commissioners is on file in this office, but no printed copies thereof appear to have been made.

The commission did not audit or consider claims of the "Enrolled Missouri Militia," as said militia were not ordered to be enrolled until July 25, 1862.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. COCKRELL. The reading need not go further. Then there is a reference in the report to various acts. On the 22d of January, 1864, the proceedings of the Hawkins Taylor board were confirmed, and appropriation was made to pay the claims audited by them, and under these laws and proceedings the Missouri Home Guards were paid for their services a bounty, and their pensions were provided for by the authority of the United States; but no provision was made for certificates of discharge to be issued to them, and this bill is simply to remedy that omission and authorize the Secretary of War to issue certificates of discharge according to the lists furnished.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POTOMAC FREE BRIDGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the reading of the report accompanying the bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia, report No. 154.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER February 11, 1884:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, submit the following report:

Congress, by act approved February 23, 1881, authorized the construction of a bridge across the Potomac at or near Georgetown. The point was to be selected by the Secretary of War, the bridge to be a substantial iron and masonry bridge with approaches, and $140,000 was appropriated therefor; but this was to be the maximum cost, and was to include the cost of a substantial bridge across the canal and any and all approaches. It was further provided that a draw of sufficient width to permit the free passage of vessels navigating that part of the Potomac River should be constructed in said bridge, unless it should be constructed upon, or by the side of, the present aqueduct and at the same or greater elevation above the water.

The Secretary of War was authorized, in his discretion, to purchase the Aqueduct Bridge now crossing the Potomac River at Georgetown, provided the same could be purchased for $85,000 and a good title acquired, allowing the Alexandria Canal Company, or its present lessees, to maintain at their own cost a canal aqueduct of the same width and depth as the one now in use, and to attach or suspend it to the bridge, the construction, attachment, and maintenance of such canal aqueduct to be determined by the Secretary of War, but without cost or liability to the United States or the District of Columbia. In accordance with the terms of said act, the Secretary of War, determining that it was for the public interest to purchase the bridge at the site of the present Aqueduct Bridge, instituted proceedings to procure the necessary rights, franchises, and privileges. The parties claiming to be the parties in interest refused to accept the terms of the act. The fee of the property is in the Alexandria Canal Company, but it is held under a ninety-nine years' lease by the Alexandria Canal, Railroad and Bridge Company. The lessees showed a willingness to treat for a relinquishment of their franchise, but the lessors, by a formal resolution, adopted at a meeting of the stockholders in Alexandria, May 16, 1881, refused to "accept the act of Congress." It was then determined to select a new site for the bridge, and, after due consideration, one was selected at a point known as the Three Sisters, above the Aqueduct Bridge. Specifications were prepared and proposals invited for building said bridge. The lowest bid received was for the exact amount appropriated, and proposed the construction of a bridge insufficient in strength. The Secretary of War submits a detailed estimate for a substantial bridge at the Three Sisters, showing that it will require for the bridge proper, approaches, and necessary inspection and tests of work an additional sum of $61,000 for what is known as a "deck bridge," and for a through bridge, which is considered preferable, an additional sum of $19,000, or a total additional sum for a through bridge at the Three Sisters of $80,000.

Secretary Lincoln recommends this appropriation in the following terms (see Executive Document 156, Forty-seventh Congress):

"I have the honor, in view of the foregoing, to recommend that an additional appropriation of $80,000 be made to give practical effect to the act of February 23, 1881, and that said act be so amended as to permit the payment of necessary expenses previous to the award of the contract and thereafter in supervising its performance."

In 1852 one of the most distinguished engineers in the United States, Charles Ellett, jr., recommended in the strongest terms the same point for the bridge, and the recommendation was concurred in by the corporation of Georgetown.

The following indorsement was made on that report by leading citizens of that city, which the committee submit:

Having the fullest confidence in the correctness of Mr. Ellett's opinion, and that a bridge can nowhere else be erected so as to secure the great objects of promoting the general welfare and public convenience, without inflicting loss or injury upon any party however remotely interested in the improvement, we most earnestly and respectfully pray that Congress may adopt the same, and make an appropriation for its seasonable erection.

In conclusion, your memorialists also beg leave, most respectfully, to renew the expression of the opposition of the people and authorities of Georgetown to the erection of any more bridges below their harbor, as well as to any plans or schemes for other purposes that may invade the rights to which they are justly and naturally entitled.

B. J. SEMMES.

GEORGETOWN, D. C., December 22, 1852.

In his report at that date Colonel Ellett named $297,870 as the cost of the bridge. He says:

"in making this estimate, as in arranging the plan of the structure, I have not deemed it at all expedient or proper to practice a close economy

"It would seem to be more appropriate, in designing a structure to be erected within sight of the Capitol for the conveyance of all travel across the Potomac on the great northern and southern thoroughfare, rather to seek to make the edifice a monument of strength and stability worthy of the site and its purposes. I shall therefore submit a liberal estimate and assume that a work of the first order is to be erected."

More than 3,000 petitioners have heretofore memorialized Congress on this subject, stating their grievances and requesting relief. It appears that under the provisions of various acts of Congress all the bridges which afford access to the city of Washington have been purchased by the United States and thrown open to the public, with the exception of the Aqueduct Bridge, upon which tolls alleged to be exorbitant are collected, to the inconvenience and positive detriment of the citizens of Washington and the country lying south of it, especially the people of Alexandria, Fairfax, Loudoun, and other counties in Virginia, who, being largely engaged in the dairy and trucking business, require constant intercourse with their customers in this city and Georgetown.

The soundness of the policy which seeks to remove all unnecessary barriers to personal and commercial intercourse between the residents of a large and rapidly growing city and surrounding country having been fully recognized by Congress in the various acts passed for the purchase of all other bridges in the immediate vicinity of Washington, and declaring them free bridges, the committee can not doubt that similar action will be taken in this case.

Congress is committed to the policy of free commercial intercourse also by the purchase of all turnpike roads running into the District, and declaring them free roads.

The United States to-day pays the Aqueduct Bridge Company $500 for the use of the bridge for the Fort Myer teams alone.

Thousands of people who annually go to Arlington to honor the nation's dead are taxed by this corporation.

In conclusion, your committee submit that past experience demonstrates that it is a waste of time to treat with the aqueduct company, and after a careful investigation of the title to the Aqueduct Bridge are convinced that a title could not be secured for many years, if at all. The decision of the United States circuit court of last week, adverse to the claim of the United States to the Virginia stock, and the appeal from that court to the supreme court of appeals, is not the beginning of the delays and difficulties that would follow an effort to secure title from the several conflicting interests in that bridge.

In the mean time a practical prohibition to travel to this section of Virginia would remain.

The committee therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will simply state that a few days ago I gave notice that I should ask the Senate to take up this bill on Monday next. It may be that there may be no objection to it on the part of any Senator, but some may have expected that it would not be taken up until Monday. I do not propose to do anything wrong in the matter, but I propose to go right on with the bill now if it is within the proprieties of the Senate to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to proceeding with the bill under Rule VIII. Amendments are proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which will be read in their order.

The first amendment was after the word "bridge," in line 16, to insert "which said bridge shall not be less than fourteen feet in the clear above the water-line of said canal;" so as to make the first proviso read:

Provided, That the said Secretary of War shall construct a bridge upon such plan as shall cost no more than the amount herein appropriated, and which cost shall include the construction of a substantial iron bridge over the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal and highway, and any and all approaches to the said iron bridge, which said bridge shall not be less than fourteen feet in the clear above the water-line of said canal; and not exceeding $15,000 of this appropriation shall be paid out of the Treasury until contracts shall have been entered into with responsible parties, and with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the construction and completion of said bridge, including the masonry, iron-work, and approaches, at a cost not to exceed $220,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "that," in line 27, to strike out the following words:

The sum which may be expended under this act shall be treated and regarded as a part of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge upon its 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia."

And to insert in lieu thereof—

One-fourth of the expense of the construction of said bridge shall be charged to and paid by the District of Columbia, and the balance (three-fourths) of the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I observe by the amendment that one-fourth of the entire expense of the construction of the bridge is to be charged to the District of Columbia and three-fourths to the United States. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Virginia who has charge of the bill why the State of Virginia should not be required to pay a portion of the expense of the construction of this bridge? It is equally for the advantage of that State as for the advantage of the District.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I would say to the Senator that I believe the only people who have not free access to the City of Washington to-day are the Virginia people. Every highway leading into this city has been made free, every toll-gate has been removed from every public road that was once a toll-road leading into the District of Columbia, and it was all done by this Government, by act of Congress. There is a very good reason why Virginia should not be required to pay any portion of this expense. In asking Congress to pass this bridge bill in 1881, and again in 1884, we are asking them to confiscate 2,720 shares of stock in the Aqueduct Bridge, which were once to that State a profitable investment. Virginia has been asking Congress to confiscate that property only that they may erect another bridge over which her people may have access to this capital city. We have been so tied up with what has been called the lease of the Aqueduct Bridge as that it has been impossible for anybody on the other side of the Potomac River to get here or anybody on this side to get there without paying the most exorbitant toll known over any bridge or highway in the United States. Fifty cents is exacted for the privilege of driving across the Aqueduct Bridge to Arlington and back. Children must pay two cents for foot passage. Nobody can come from the other side of the Potomac to market without paying a toll of 20 cents per head for the horses that drag the carts or the horses that pull the wagons.

But the question which the Senator from Wisconsin propounds is, Why should not Virginia pay some of this expense? I think my answer is sufficient, that in giving up 2,720 shares of that stock, almost one-half the Aqueduct Bridge that stands there to-day, we are certainly giving enough.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. For whose benefit is that given up?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. We take it for granted that it is for the benefit of the lessees of the Aqueduct Bridge on account of the contract made by the Government of the United States as a party, to which Virginia was not a party, and she has not even the poor privilege of signing the contract that forfeits her stock.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If it is given up for the benefit of the United States I can see the force of the argument, but if it be given up for the benefit of some private party I certainly fail to see that it has any force whatever.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I can inform the Senator that if it is given up at all it will go to the United States Government, because the very moment you construct a bridge at the Three Sisters that moment you destroy all the profits that these lessees have been getting from the Aqueduct Bridge, and they will abandon it, and you will then get back the property that belongs to you. It is the only way that you will ever get it. They have it till 1899, according to the lease.

In 1881 you passed this same bill except only that you said the Secretary of War might have discretion to buy the Aqueduct Bridge. The lessees never will sell it, never will abandon the lease for which they pay a thousand dollars to the Government of the United States, and then have a contract with that Government by which they get back $500 for the privilege of passing supplies across to Fort Myer. The Government of the United States, though it appears to have a lease for a thousand dollars, gives back half of it for the transportation of commissary stores to Fort Myer. They will never give it up, and their report shows that with this contract they have been realizing on an average more than $12,000 a year actual profit from that bridge. In view of this fact, I feel sure that there is but one way by which we can ever have free ingress and egress to and from this city, and that is by renewing the bill Congress passed in 1881 without that provision giving discretion to the Secretary of War, so as to require the construction of a free bridge at a point close to the Aqueduct Bridge.

I have heard some Senators suggest that we were a mile and a half above the Aqueduct Bridge. It is not three-eighths of a mile from the Aqueduct Bridge to the point at which it is proposed to locate this bridge, and I want to ask Senators' attention to that. It is not three-eighths of a mile from the Washington end of the Aqueduct Bridge to the point where it is proposed to construct the new bridge. On the other side of the river the distance is a mile and a half—a mile and a half of rugged, hilly road, that now requires people to go three miles out of their way to get to the city of Washington over the Aqueduct Bridge that subserves no purpose except the benefit of the people of Alexandria city and county who have the benefit of the Long Bridge. It is a mile and a half on the other side. The fair way to discuss this question is to consider the distance on this side; and the people on the other side of the river who choose to use the new bridge can come to the city of Washington by a mile and a half less distance on this proposed bridge than they can possibly do over the Aqueduct Bridge.

Mr. President, I do not propose to go into an elaborate discussion of this matter, and I do not suppose I have any right to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's five minutes have expired.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wanted to answer the question of the Senator from Wisconsin and to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that they are only asked to do now what they did once before, and I hope they will do it promptly.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, on the 23d of February, 1881, Congress passed "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." The second section of that act provided:

That for the purpose of establishing a free bridge, and in lieu of erecting the bridge provided for in the preceding section, the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, purchase the Aqueduct Bridge now crossing the Potomac River at Georgetown: Provided, Said bridge with all the appurtenances, rights, and franchises connected therewith, including piers and real estate for abutments and approaches, can be purchased for a sum not exceeding $85,000; which sum or so much thereof as may be necessary may be paid out of the money appropriated by this act: Provided further, That a good and sufficient title thereto can be secured to the United States, to be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States.

This is followed by certain other provisions in relation to things to be done and acts to be performed by the Alexandria Canal Company or their lessees in connection with the canal aqueduct that is connected with the bridge. The negotiations which the Secretary of War entered into at that time for the purpose of securing a title to the Aqueduct Bridge fell through in consequence of the unwillingness of the parties in interest to comply with the terms of this act. Since that time, and since I may say the reporting of this bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, all the parties in interest have formally agreed to accept the terms of the act of February 23, 1881, so that at this time by the payment of the sum of $85,000 the Government can secure absolutely the title to and the possession of the Aqueduct Bridge and a free bridge can be obtained probably within the next thirty days.

This bill passed the Committee on the District of Columbia against my judgment and was reported on the 25th of February last, since which time it has been lying on the Calendar. I think that any person who examines the topography of the Potomac River, and who is familiar with the requirements of the communities which this bridge is to accommodate, would have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that if there is no objection arising from the difficulty of obtaining the title to this property or of securing the substructure there in case it might be thought necessary to put a new structure upon the piers, the site occupied by the Aqueduct Bridge is vastly preferable to any other that has ever been suggested.

In connection with this subject it is perhaps appropriate that I should call the attention of the Senate to a communication from General Hazen, the Chief Signal Officer of the United States, who was addressed upon the subject, as to the interests of the Government in connection with this matter. If the Government of the United States is to be called upon to pay three-fourths of the cost of this structure, evidently its interests and convenience ought to be consulted. It is desirable that some means of easy and ready access should be obtained to Arlington, to the National Cemetery, to Fort Whipple where the Signal Service of the Government is largely carried on, on the heights to the north of Arlington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Senator's time be extended, or if I have the floor in my right I yield my time to him.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose by unanimous consent the Senator from Kansas may proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. INGALLS. It will be impossible to conclude the proper consideration of this bill in the time that is to elapse between this period and that when the regular order will come before the Senate. I have no objection, if the consideration of the bill can be continuously carried on, to its being discussed now; but in view of the importance of the subject and of the amount that the United States Government will be called upon to expend if the bill becomes a law, it is obviously unjust that a matter of this consequence should be considered under the application of the five-minute rule and debated till 2 o'clock. I shall not be able to present the views that I wish to submit and the documentary evidence bearing upon the subject in my possession, within the time between this and the morning hour. I would, therefore, suggest to the Senator from Virginia that perhaps the bill might go over until a subsequent day when this whole matter can be presented.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kansas will yield a moment I will suggest to him and the Senator from Virginia, and if they approve I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that this bill may hold its place subject to be called up by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and when called up freed from the limit of five minutes' debate. It is important that the bill should be considered as early as we can satisfactorily consider it; but in view of the information the Senator from Kansas is now giving the Senate in respect to the Aqueduct Bridge, or the piers of that bridge, I think it is important that the committee should, at I care not how early a day, thoroughly consider the information that the Senator from Kansas is now giving, in order that it may come here prepared to give a distinct recommendation in respect to the matter the one way or the other.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understand the Senator from Kansas will not be here after to-day for some time, in all probability.

Mr. INGALLS. That is true. I shall be compelled to leave the city to-morrow, on business that imperatively demands my attention, and may not return until the close of the following week. But at the same time it seems to me that, inasmuch as there have been two decisions of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, communicated to the committee since the date of this report, bearing directly upon the interests of the Government in the subject-matter of the controversy, that it would be proper that this bill should be further considered by the committee. I feel delicate about asking that the bill should be committed, because I opposed it in committee. It was reported against my consent, by a majority of the committee. By that action, of course, I am bound. If I were with the majority of the committee, I should ask that the bill might be recommitted, but I do not feel at liberty to make that motion.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, I repeat as one who favored the reporting of this bill with the recommendation that it pass, that in view of the information the Senator from Kansas discloses, I am not satisfied to proceed with the consideration of the bill until the committee have thoroughly considered the information given by the Senator from Kansas. Instead of recommitting, however, if the Senate will give its consent that the bill may hold its place on the Calendar subject to be called up by the committee, giving the committee time to consider the matter suggested by the Senator from Kansas, I would propose that course. I do not desire to delay the consideration of the bill one moment longer than is absolutely necessary to develop the information that the Senate ought to have before it takes final action on the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee make any motion?

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Virginia consent to the suggestion that I make?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have not understood it. What is the suggestion?

Mr. HARRIS. Then I will put it in a tangible form. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that this bill may hold its place upon the Calendar subject to be called up by the Committee on the District of Columbia at such time as it may be ready to act upon it, and that in the mean time the committee will consider the information developed by the remarks of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understand that it is on the Calendar and will come up regularly on Monday morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will permit the Chair to say that the Senator from Tennessee proposes that when called up it should be as under Rule IX, when he first mentioned it.

Mr. HARRIS. That it should be relieved from the five-minute limit as to debate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It will come up regularly on Monday morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is the unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understand so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be in order under Rule VIII on Monday.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then there is no necessity for accepting any proposition about it. It just goes over until Monday, and I should like the Senator from Kansas, whatever objections he has to the bill, to file them to-day, because, as I understand, he will be away on Monday. If he can have that privilege I should like to suggest that he file his objections to-day, so that the bill may not be prejudiced by his absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless gentlemen make some agreement soon the Chair must announce that the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. COKE. If the proposition is for the committee to call this bill up at any time during the morning between 12 and 2 o'clock under Rule VIII, I have no objection to interpose.

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly my proposition, that it hold its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII, but shall be relieved from the five-minute limit as to debate when called up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I shall object to relieving it of the five-minute limit of debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. HARRIS. I now ask the Senator in charge of that bill, and the unanimous consent of the Senate, that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] may proceed with whatever statement he may desire to lay before the Senate in respect to the bridge bill, in order that the Committee on the District of Columbia may at least have his views clearly and distinctly expressed when we come to act upon the state of facts that he may suggest to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair should perhaps state that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] gave notice that at this hour he would ask that the regular order be suspended that he might submit some remarks upon a pending resolution.

Mr. WILSON. The suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee with reference to the information which the Senator from Kansas desires to put in possession of the Senate concerning the bridge bill would seem to be of some importance in view of the fact that the Senator from Kansas expects to be absent from the city. If it is thought best for me to give way for him to do that, I shall certainly do so.

Mr. INGALLS. I think I have the information that I shall desire to lay before the Senate in such shape in the form of written and printed matter at my disposal that I can place it probably in the hands of some other member of the committee so that the Senate can be definitely advised as to the relative rights of the parties in the matter. But I still think that the Senate will not be in a condition to act intelligently upon this matter until the committee have had further time to examine it and report in view of what has occurred since the bill was reported on the 25th of February.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to give notice that I am not willing to proceed with the consideration of this bill until the committee shall have further considered it, and I desire to obtain that consideration at the expense of as little delay as possible, but whatever may be necessary I shall insist upon.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator from Tennessee will permit me to say that all the information which is printed in the pamphlet to which the Senator from Kansas refers was before the committee; every line of it was before the committee except the opinion of the judge of the United States district court, but the substance of that opinion even was before the committee, the committee understanding the whole purport of it. There is nothing new in this document at all.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is strangely mistaken, because he must be aware that long since the report was filed the lessees of the Alexandria Canal Company have left with the committee their formal acceptance of the act of February 23, 1881. That was never before the committee for its consideration and could not have been, because it came in long since the committee reported the bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This discussion continues by unanimous consent.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask consent simply to make a brief statement, because Senators think about these matters sometimes on Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. PLUMB. As this is likely to ripen into something of a debate, unless it subserves the special convenience of some member who may not be present at a subsequent period when the bill shall come up in the ordinary course, I shall feel constrained to object, because I can not conceive in the first place that it is of as much importance as the measure pending which has the right of way, and in the second place the debate now undoubtedly will cover a space that will be covered at a future consideration of this bill. Therefore, without any disrespect to the Senator from Virginia, I object to the further continuation of debate.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. For this purpose I understand the unfinished business is simply informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. WILSON April 17, 1884:

Whereas the Constitution delegates to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is competent for Congress, in the exercise of the power so delegated, to provide by law for such regulation of the transportation of commerce among the several States as shall include a system of maximum and minimum rates of charges for the same; for free competition between the limits so fixed; for the prohibition of discriminations of any kind whatever, either in favor of or against cities, towns, or other localities, whether the same be competing or non-competing points; for applying the same principle to transportation for individuals, firms, associations, or corporations in all matters relating to commerce among the States; for the preservation and enforcement of the right of shippers to select the lines and parts of lines over which their shipments shall pass, to the end that said commerce may avail itself of the all-rail or part rail and part water routes of the country; for the prevention of such pooling arrangements and agreements, to refrain from just competition as may tend to impose unreasonable burdens upon said commerce among the States; for the protection of said commerce against unjust exactions based on a class of securities commonly denominated "watered stock," and for the promotion of the true interests of both the corporations employed in such transportation and the people and localities engaged in such commerce, by an enforcement of the principles hereinbefore stated, and thereby induce harmony and stability in the affairs of the said corporations, people, and localities.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the principles and elements of this resolution are formulated in Senate bill No. 1142, "to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, prescribe the duties thereof, and for other purposes," introduced by me on January 17 last, and referred to the Committee on Railroads. Several other bills relating to the same subject are also before that committee, and are doubtless receiving at its hands the prudent and considerate attention which their admitted importance demands.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Iowa will allow me a word. On behalf of the Committee on Railroads I desire to state for the information of the Senator as well as the Senate that the committee are prepared to report a bill on that subject, and I shall, on behalf of the committee, report it perhaps on Monday, and ask the Senate to fix an early day for its consideration.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the principles, subjects, and interests treated of in these bills are of such character as to enjoin greatest care and most conservative action in whatsoever may be done concerning them. The field of legislative action into which they extend is not a new one, though many of its most forceful characteristics are of comparatively recent origin. It is an old field with many new occupants. How best to treat it and them is a problem at which we may work long and diligently before effecting a perfect solution. It is so complex that we may well be content to work it out by sections.

The forces which have evolved the unexampled conditions of development and progress in this country have been both subtle and aggressive. So noiselessly have they wrought on in their ceaseless advances that we have but imperfectly understood them, and so rapid and wondrous have been their results that our attention has been so firmly held in contemplation of effects that we have been too unmindful of the causes which produced them. Each of the later decades of our national life has been marvelously fruitful of effects in aid of our material, intellectual, educational, and moral progress. So forcefully true is this that when we bring to our contemplation the sum total of the last four decades in this regard we seem to have been put into possession of a new world. We have not failed to notice the changes which have been going on. On all occasions and under all circumstances we have boastingly proclaimed them. The increase of population, the development of our material resources, the accumulation of our wealth, the wonders of our scientific achievements, the bewildering successes of our inventors, the sturdy on-march of our educational institutions, methods, and systems, the excellent instrumentalities and modes of our great inland commerce, and each and every other factor which has come to be a part of our much bepraised national case has singly, and have as an aggregation, been proclaimed to ourselves at home and to the world abroad in our most pronounced and resonant sounds of praise. And in these several respects we have nothing to blush for even though the whole world looks into our face. So far as these facts are concerned we have a possession of transcendent magnificence.

We deal with this possession through our laws, and here we find the weakest point in our case. The progress of the science of law-making has not been as great as the forces which evolved the results named have been active. We have not fitted our system of laws to the new conditions which so suddenly have come upon us. Hence we feel those frictions which jolt and jar our movements. We have grown in all directions and in every respect so rapidly that we have been neglectful of that careful study of the changes which have transpired and of the new relations which they have imposed. But while this is true it is no new happening in the experiences of peoples and governments. It seems more pronounced in our case because of the rapidity of its development and its exceptional character in almost every regard. But the fact remains that we have developed and progressed more rapidly than our laws have been adjusted to the facts and movements.

No more striking illustration of the truth of this statement exists than that presented by the subject to which the resolution now before the Senate and the bills alluded to by me relate, and I am not unmindful of the great difficulties which surround it. But that subject is not exceptional in this regard. Indeed, all of the great changes which have transpired in the recent past of this country present to us characteristic difficulties in degree more or less perplexing. And the fact that great difficulties attend the subject now before us merely serves to define its character and importance as one calling for resolute and at the same time considerate and conservative legislative action. These three elements should be present in whatever law we may enact for the regulation of the transportation of the interstate commerce of this country, for when we come to legislate on this subject we will treat of one whose ramifications are bounded by those lines which define the territorial jurisdiction of the nation, whose touch is both forceful and delicate in every section and community of the country and in and about every industry and employment of our people. The methods and appliances through which it now operates constitute it one of the comparatively new forces of our present civilization, and have enabled it to do more toward inducing the conditions attendant upon trade and commerce than any other one thing that has transpired since we became an independent people and government.

So far as concerns interstate commerce, this comparatively new force practically has had its own way. But there is a conviction as widespread as the country that this great force should be put into right relations with the people and their business and true interests wheresoever they are and of whatsoever kind they be. But this can not be safely and wisely done by the introduction of new principles into such legislation as we may enact. It is regulation based upon recognized and established principles, and which shall alike be fair and just to all parties and interests concerned, that is demanded, and not an application of experimental interferences which may result in more harm than good. Any system of regulation which fails to recognize the reciprocal relations existing between the public, which is the aggregation of the people and their varied interests, the individuals constituting the components thereof and their multiform occupations, and the transporting corporations will almost certainly result in harmful interferences from which all will soon pray to be released. And hence we must be careful not to allow the follies and interferences of the transporting corporations to induce us to engage in efforts and reprisals through methods as questionable as those against which we lodge our complaints. Public laws are not proper repositories for resentments and revenges. And the makers of public laws must be careful to exclude from their work the resentments which far too often characterize the actions of the private individual.

This rule has been observed both in the resolution now under consideration and in the bill to which I have referred. Neither of them propose a system for the regulation of interstate commerce not founded in its every feature upon firmly established principles of law concerning the several matters to which they relate. It is not their purpose or office to declare new rights, but to recover the possession and assure the enjoyment of those that are as old as our law; to apply to the new conditions which have become established in this country through proper methods established by law the principles which have attached to the common carrier and his employment from the earliest times of the common law, and we cannot excuse non-action in the premises. There is cause for the action proposed, and it is quite time that a start be made toward a recognition of the necessity for a just, considerate, and effective legislative response to the demands which come to us from all sections of the country.

Mr. President, there are some things embedded in the practical administration of the transportation system of this country which must be reached and removed. But it is well to remember that while this is indisputably true it is equally true that many most desirable and admirable things are to be found therein. The case is far from being wholly bad, though it often is presented to the public in that light, and here it also is well to remember that the Government and the public are largely responsible for the presence of some of the worst features of the case, while the administration of the system is entitled to credit for some of its most admirable factors and results. Hence in our investigation of the case we will not find either party wholly on the debit or wholly on the credit side of the general balance-sheet.

There is no more interesting study connected with the development and progress of our country than that which discloses the introduction and growth of the railway system. And we can not wisely legislate on the subject without first having devoted patient and toilsome care in studying the wondrous details which thread it in every part. This is no field for passion or prejudice or revenge to enter upon. We find in it the highest character of legislative duty, and this can not be discharged with wise efficiency except by an observance of those rules which enforce even-handed justice.

When we consider that the construction of railroads commenced in this country as late as 1827, and was not fairly under way until 1835, and that we now have in operation about 121,000 miles, representing in one way and another a capital investment stated at about $6,383,477,210, we find ourselves at once in a bewildering field of inquiry, and a proper degree of reflection concerning the data which this field of inquiry furnishes to us will force us to the conclusion that the absence of thought and care on the part of the public, the States, and the General Government during the several stages of the development of our railway system has induced, organized, and given force to many of the most embarrassing features of the case. Many of the complaints present in the minds of the people are readily traceable to this cause. From the beginning the public, the States, and the General Government seem to have given themselves up almost wholly to effecting present needs, desires, and purposes, and to have given little or no thought as to what consequences might be projected into the future by their action.

The General Government was the last to act; but it was as oblivious to the effect of its action on the future as the public and the States had been. More thought, greater care might have saved the country from many of the causes of complaint on which the people plant themselves now. But it is not just to hold either the public, the States, or the General Government as criminally negligent in this regard. It is always easier to look back and find fault than it is to look forward and act wisely, and it is not fair to use this easier process as a means for denouncing the actors of the past as criminal because they did not, by resorting to the harder method, save us from the effects of which we now complain. The public, the States, and the General Government, so far as their action concerned the development of the railway system of the country, moved in the direction of encouragement rather than on lines of repression. They felt the pressure of a need and they meant to create a servant to supply it. They little thought how soon a free servant may become a master, and so did not encumber it with appliances of restraint. They were impelled by the subtle and persistent forces to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks, and without understanding them gave them free play.

This is not a new feature in the movements of men or governments. When new agencies first appear in the progressive activities of a people they are very apt to be allowed great freedom of action and rarely feel the curb of restraint. And especially is this true of such as promise to promote business interests by accelerating its operations and expanding the field of its conquests. The railway agency was not an exception to this rule. The first experiments with it fixed it as one of the most forceful factors that had appeared in the business world. Its every advance tended to confirm the judgment of the people in favor of its great utility. And this fact induced that unguarded liberality of treatment toward this new factor in our civilization and those who were engaged in promoting it on the part of the people and their governments, whether municipal, State, or national, and from which have outgrown most if not all of the evils now found in the powers and practices of railway corporations, and of which individuals, communities, and the general public to-day complain.

The result here involved was not a necessity, but it was a natural consequence of that want of proper consideration of the possibilities of the case so often present in human affairs. This is quite apparent to us now. Experience has given us demonstration of its truth. But the teaching of experience, while it is invariably forceful, is not always desirable. It often inflicts punishment as well as great rewards. Every nation's life, as well as every human life, is crowded full of proof of this fact, and the wonder is that we have not derived greater benefit from it than we can lay claim to. But I know of no other rule of conduct that will improve our predicament in this regard than the one which imposes the duty of thought before action. If we fail to observe the wise caution of this rule we should remember that a dutiful concern for our own failings will be more becoming than unrestrained complainings.

Step by step, year by year, the railway system of this country grew. In 1830 only twenty-three miles of railway were in operation in the United States; in 1840 there were 2,821 miles in operation; in 1850, 9,021 miles. The growth of the system had been unrestrained, and but little thought had been given to the possible consequences which might arise from the incautious grants of power made to railway corporations. What they asked for was given upon the asking and as a matter of course. The country was feeling the beneficial effects of a comparatively new force. Individuals, towns, cities, counties, and States involved themselves in various ways to impel the development of the system, each intent on an immediate gain of profit or other advantage, and all unmindful of whatsoever else might come. But this was not a new feature in the progress of human affairs. On the contrary, it was but a repetition of what has occurred as often as new and forceful factors have appeared in the operations of men and in the march of the world's civilization. It is only when unrestrained methods, gathering force from their freedom of action, begin to manifest how closely everything in organized society is related by asserting as their own powers which belong more or less in common to all that they excite attention to their movements and induce resistance.

The railway system had not reached this juncture at the period of time to which I have referred. In 1850 the railroad had so well demonstrated its power as a developing force that it arrested the attention of the legislative department of the General Government. It is true that its characteristics then were quite primitive when compared with what they now are. The railroad of 1850 in its construction, equipment, and administration would present a strange and even laughable contrast with the trunk lines of to-day. Still it was a masterful spirit and gave promise of doing for the country just what appeared to be its great need. Our States and settlements had advanced toward the West until we were forced to take cognizance of the vast possibilities of the regions of the prairies and the plains. There was an almost limitless empire to conquer and subdue for and to the use and purposes of our restless and progressive population. Illinois had been admitted into the Union as a State in 1818. She possessed vast capabilities, but in 1850 her population had reached only 851,470 souls. The best portions of the State were not occupied and could not be for want of adequate means of reaching a market. Her possibilities were recognized by all, but they were locked up in the bosom of her grand prairies. The railroad offered a key to unlock the great treasure-house, let the waiting people enter and possess themselves of the riches therein stored.

The tendered key was accepted, not merely by the impatient and importunate people of Illinois, but by the nation. The subject was introduced into Congress by Mr. Douglas, then a Senator from that State. The result was the passage of the act of September 2, 1850, making a grant of lands to the State, which was devoted to the construction of the Illinois Central Railroad. I shall not now stop to discuss either the merits or the defects of that act. It began a policy relative to the public lands and railroads which had a long run in Congress and a wide application to the country. The country approved it, and for many years it would have been difficult for any man to have secured an election to Congress from any Western State in opposition to that policy. Indeed, I may state the case in stronger terms, and say that it would have been extremely difficult to have secured an election to Congress from any of those States except by an approval of that policy and upon a pledge to promote it. Everybody then was in favor of it, just as everybody is opposed to it now. State legislatures were memorializing Congress at every session to apply the policy to their respective States, political conventions and public meetings were resolving, business organizations and private citizens were petitioning in favor of the application of the policy to their particular sections and interests. These importunities were common and almost universal. What was the result? Why, that the grants of public lands made during the years in which that policy had its run amounted to an aggregate of about 209,904,807 acres, of which, according to the estimate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the States and companies in interest have received and will receive title to some 185,297,517 acres.

But while this action was being had and the land-grant policy was having its run, no one cared to inquire into the value of the public domain that was given away. Indeed, it was said everywhere and by everybody that the great possession which the nation had in its public lands was worthless unless it could be utilized, and that this would never be except through the construction of railroads; and so one-half of the lands within given limits were granted and the Government doubled its minimum price on the half which it reserved; and it was also urged in favor of the policy that it would be a forceful ally to the homestead measure by assuring transportation to market within easy reach of the many thousands who would establish themselves in free homes under the operation of that beneficent law; and thus the Government was to make money by selling its reserved lands within the limits of the grants at double minimum price, and the people were to have comparatively easy access to other portions of the public domain, from which they could take their farms and homes without money and without price.

The policy had its beginning; it ran its course and it reached its end. Then commenced a course of complaint which became as general against the once favored policy as importunities had been widespread in its favor. Doubtless there are solid grounds of complaint. But the careful observer will readily detect many substantial benefits standing alongside of them. The case is not wholly bad by any means. Imperfect, unguarded, and unbridled as the policy was, it wrought out wondrous results for this country. It did what the people and the Government desired it should do. It induced a development in the States and Territories covered by it unprecedented in the affairs of any people. The year 1850, which marks the inauguration of the policy, found those States and Territories with an aggregate population of 2,749,324. The census of 1880 shows that they then possessed a population of 20,662,104. It is not necessary to follow these figures into the lines of details which they suggest relative to the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, mines, wealth, and the moral and educational conditions which abound in the regions covered by them. From the State of Illinois, where the policy first quickened the forces of development and progress, to the Pacific States, where its influence was last felt, the things which were done in those twenty years bewilder us when we contemplate them, and would have been quite beyond our belief had they been suggested at the beginning. They well repay us for the policy which evolved them, and they would not have been but for its adoption.

The people and Congress regarded it as a means to make possible the things which are now facts. The thought of the country, of the private citizen, and the public man was directed to the creation of an agency which should upbuild States, unfold the riches of unoccupied regions, induce wealth, supply productions and commodities, evolve commerce, and promote the general welfare. It failed duly to consider the questions of checks and balances with which to restrain that agency in right lines of action, and to keep it in harmony with great, varied, complex and in many respects delicate interests which its movements established. It acted in one line and for one purpose, and waited for the spur of experience to give it other directions and a broader comprehension, and now a decent regard for consistency will not justify the Government, nor political parties, nor statesmen, nor private citizens, in turning to rend the agent which they all invoked to conjure the surpassing magnificences which have come to them.

In the vast regions covered by that policy, now the most prosperous on the globe, possibilities were abundant, but they could not make States, nor wealth, nor business, nor progress. They embraced them all, but something was needed to unlock the embrace and give freedom of action, and hence the railroad was invoked, loaded with Government aid, and sent out to unlock that embrace, give freedom of action, turn possibilities into facts, push civilization across the continent, develop and establish the superb empire which is the pride and glory of our people to-day. It obeyed the call. It stretched its lines where there was no business to support it and created it. It grew strong and wrought out every purpose and result it was ordered to effect. It did more than this. It established a new era in its own movements. Having developed States, created business, supplied the elements of commerce, and quickened mere possibilities into realized facts, it put an end to the policy of extending Government aid to railway corporations. But railroad-building did not stop. Lines were constructed in all directions through the wondrous empire opened up by the policy which had exhausted itself and died. It had supplied business for unaided roads and they were built, and their multiplication is going on to-day. The policy had demonstrated how business would spring into life and ever-increasing volume whenever the railroad touched it with its quickening forces. It was no longer a question of doubt whether business must precede the railroad or the railroad precede business. No matter which condition prevailed, success was reasonably assured. So perfectly has this been made to appear that we are now apt to wonder why we ever were in doubt about it, and why we ever extended aid to railroad corporations at any time. The results confound us and often confuse our judgments, and right here we are confronted by one of the most important and delicate phases of the whole case.

The magnitude of the railway system, comprehending in its comparatively limitless ramifications every section of the country and every element of business, trade, commerce, and material interest, renders it a subject of most solicitous concern to the people. A growing conviction has ripened into a definite judgment that the time has arrived for the Government to carefully consider and wisely adjust the relations subsisting between the system in its methods of administration and the affairs of the people. A number of the States have acted for themselves in this regard. But their powers are circumscribed by their own borders, and are wholly inadequate to meet the exigencies of the general case. Congress, therefore, has been appealed to for national legislation as a means through which to place the great transportation agent of the country into right lines of action, and to hold it there. Every portion of the country has demanded that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States shall be put in motion, and that laws be enacted to effectuate right relations, conditions, and practices between the people and this most potential of all their commercial agencies.

This demand for regulative legislation is not a mere caprice of the people. Its growth has been gradual, and it had its origin in substantial causes of complaint. It doubtless has been intensified by designing and skillful manipulation of subjects which have no proper relation to the commercial features of the case. The manipulations have been in great degree worked from the political standpoint, and too often for the promotion of personal and partisan ends rather than for proper commercial objects and right public purposes. Passions have been inflamed by denunciations of railroad corporations as unconscionable recipients of land grants and other subsidies from the Government without any regard being paid to the fact that the grants were quite as willingly given as received; and that the whole business was but a part of the policy to which I have already adverted as having had the support of the entire country.

But if all of the propositions relative to questions said to be involved in those grants and the alleged forfeitures connected with them had been enacted into laws, the real and most important matters at issue between the Government, the people, and the railroad corporations would still remain unsolved and untouched. If Congress should declare a forfeiture of every railroad land grant ever made by it, the great commercial problem would still remain as completely untouched and unsolved as it is to-day. And even the questions embraced in the several acts of forfeiture would still remain subjects for judicial determination; and it seems to me that if a general act had been passed by Congress years ago directing the Attorney-General to proceed in the courts against all land-grant companies alleged to be in default of the conditions running with their several grants for the purpose of obtaining judicial determinations of forfeiture against them, great practical results would have been reached and much useless agitation avoided. This would have removed the entire subject from Congress where it has consumed years of time without producing any compensatory results. And it seems to me that it would be wise to enact such legislation now; for this would put all cases of alleged forfeiture in course of speedy adjustment, and would secure to the Government and the companies such judicial determination of the questions involved as must ultimately come, no matter what character of legislation we may enact.

Had the course here suggested been adopted at the beginning of the controversy relative to lapsed land grants, all of the rights which the Government may have lost during the years of ineffective agitation in Congress would have been reserved to it and to the people. The commencement of the action by the Attorney-General would have held in reserve every right of government and people through every stage of progress and on to the termination of the case. The commencement of an action in court is notice to everybody. But mere agitation in Congress is notice to no one; mere discussion in Congress, whether it be general in its character, or with special and definite reference to particular companies, interests, and grants, could not have the effect of notice, nor the force of protection to public rights. Nearly ten years ago the Supreme Court of the United States passed on the question here involved in the case of Schullenberger vs. Harrimon, 21 Wallace, 44, and reasserted the long-established doctrine relative to grants and forfeitures in this language, namely:

> In what manner the reserved right of the grantor for the breach of the condition must be asserted, so as to restore the estate, depends upon the character of the grant. If it be a private grant, that right must be asserted by entry or its equivalent. If the grant be a public one, it must be asserted by a judicial proceeding authorized by law, the equivalent of an inquest of office at common law, finding the fact of forfeiture, and adjudging the restoration of the estate on that ground; or there must be some legislative assertion of ownership of the property for breach of the condition, such as an act directing possession and appropriation of the property, or that it be offered for sale or settlement.

Mr. MORGAN. If it will not interfere with the Senator from Iowa I will state to him that the Committee on Public Lands have reported a bill almost precisely the same as the measure referred to. It is now on the Calendar, and I hope that it will be called up at an early day.

Mr. WILSON. I am glad to hear the statement of the Senator from Alabama, and I am only sorry that action was not taken years ago in connection with this very important subject.

The case of Schullenberger vs. Harriman was a case in which there had been an admitted breach of the condition of the grant, which was one to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of certain railroads within that Commonwealth. But the court after declaring the rule I have quoted, followed it with this conclusion:

> In the present case no action has been taken, either by legislative or judicial proceedings, to enforce a forfeiture of the estate granted by the acts of 1856 and 1864. The title remains, therefore, in the State as completely as it existed on the day when the title, by the location of the route of the railroad, acquired precision and became attached to the adjoining alternate sections.

Congress might have declared a resumption of the grant by a legislative act as soon as a breach of the condition on which it was made transpired. But even this could not have prevented the State or the companies on which it had conferred the grant from resorting to the courts for the determination of any controverted facts or judicial questions connected with the transaction, and so also Congress could, without declaring a forfeiture by legislative act, have directed the Attorney-General to institute judicial proceedings against the defaulting State or company and thereby reserved to the Government every right existing at the commencement of the action. And so it might have done by the enactment of a general law applicable to all alleged forfeitures by breach of condition and relieved itself of the ineffectual agitation about the resumption of lapsed land grants which has run through more than ten years of time and from which no result has been derived so far as a recovery of forfeited lands is concerned. And I can but believe that it would be the better course now to rid Congress entirely of this phase of the railroad question by sending it to the courts, with definite instructions to the Attorney-General to keep it there in each and every case until all of the rights of the Government and of the States and companies shall have been resolved by the only power that can conclusively do it. If delay should occur there it can work no harm to the rights of the Government or the people. But delay here endangers both. It is delay I wish to avoid, as well as to intrench against the loss of existing rights, by putting the judicial power into action. And it seems to me that no grantee corporation can afford to object to the adoption of means for the speedy adjudication of all disputed questions pending between it and the Government. But if such objection be made it must rest on the fact that legislative delay consumes the rights of the Government, and that continued and ineffective Congressional agitation and discussion are more helpful to the corporation than would be resolute judicial proceedings. On all accounts it seems to me it would be well to get this question out of the way by the method suggested, in order that it may no longer complicate the more important one which so greatly affects the commercial and other material interests of the country.

How to deal with this latter question is a problem presenting many seeming complications. But when we subject it to the crucial test of pertinent inquiry and earnest thought much of this seeming disappears and a sense of surprise occasioned by the simplicity of the problem takes possession of our minds. We find most of the difficulties almost purely imaginary, and this is but a repetition of the results which come of the application of thoughtful methods to the treatment of almost all phases of human affairs.

I shall not stop to discuss the question of the power of Congress to act in the premises. That Congress has power to regulate commerce among the several States is nominated in the bond of the Constitution. That this power is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the full volume of the problem involved in the matter of the transportation of commerce among the several States has been affirmed by the courts over and over again. Commerce among the several States exists. The Constitution confers on Congress the power to regulate it. "The power is coextensive with the subject on which it acts."

This is the doctrine declared by the courts. Hence the subject on which the power acts is its only limitation. Commerce among the several States has become too great a factor in our national existence to justify the admission of a doubt concerning the power of Congress to regulate it. The subject is too closely allied with everything involved in the general welfare to allow of any admission that it is beyond the power of Congress to regulate it. And the very fact that the railway power has become so strong in its assumptions of freedom in the choice of its own modes of action as to deny the power of Congress to regulate it is a command for prompt, resolute, just, and comprehensive legislation concerning it. That it is a power of comparatively recent growth, with its hand upon every interest known to the affairs of our people, renders it none the less important, but rather all the more imperative that efficient action should be taken in the matter of its proper regulation. That it has been allowed to up-build itself by a resort to that element of sovereignty which we call the right of eminent domain fixes not only its own importance as one of the instrumentalities of our national development and of the activities of our people but also the necessity for its regulation by law. The great gifts which it has received from the nation are cumulative evidence that its true office is to serve the public in just ways for reasonable reward, and that it is the servant and not the master of the commerce of the country. The great returns it has made to that commerce and to every phase of our progress and to the multifarious interests of society and of individuals conspire to prove how well it may deserve just treatment if it be but just itself. It has indeed given to our people many most admirable returns. It has given to them the best organized system of transportation in the world and in many respects the cheapest. It has given to them greater comfort in travel than is possessed by any other people. It has made itself necessary to their business and their comfort. It has organized a system in the lines of business administration in general and in detail second only to that of the Government itself, if, indeed, this exception can be allowed. But notwithstanding all of this its claim to be exempt from governmental regulation can not be admitted. The most that it is entitled to claim in this regard is that the laws to be enacted for its regulation shall be fair and just, and this character of regulation it needs even for its own defense against itself; for, conceding all that I have said in its favor, it is a chronic exhibition of more inexcusable follies than can be found in any other great department of business and affairs in this country.

The absence of good faith in the relations of the railroad companies with each other has become a matter of common remark and of public scandal. The more pools, combinations, and joint arrangements they make with each other, the greater their tribulations in many respects seem to grow. Newspaper columns are week after week crammed with accounts of meetings of general passenger agents, convocations of general freight agents, conferences of the general managers of different groups of lines, and givings-out of commissioners of disturbed pools. To-day the East-bound pool meets, to-morrow the West-bound pool, next the Ohio River pool, then the Iowa pool, next the Southwestern pool, again the Pacific pool, all because some member of one or the other of the pools has not kept faith in the common effort to eliminate the element of competition from the transportation of the country. The combinations of to-day are disrupted to-morrow. A secret cutting or an open war of rates in one or more groups of lines is an almost constant disturber of commercial calculations. Combination penalties seem to have no more effect in holding the contracting parties to their agreements than do the penal sections of criminal laws in the prevention of crime.

The very pretext on which pools and combinations are alleged to be based, that of assuring certainty, is eliminated from the case. This is harmful to the railroad corporations and injurious to the public. The pool and the combination destroy legitimate competition and give the public no equivalent in return. Oppressive rates even might be got along with if they but assured equality and stability. The business of the country might stand the absence of legitimate competition in the matter of transportation if it could but plant itself on the element of certainty and equality in regard to rates. But it can not prosper as it should in the absence of both competition and certainty; and the managers of the great railway interests of this country, aggregating reported capital amounting in round numbers to about $6,000,000,000, ought to feel humiliated in view of their demonstrated inability to administer their great trust more nearly on the basis of correct business principles. It is no credit to them that the securities which represent the capital invested in the great properties intrusted to their management were subjected to a shrinkage between January, 1883, and January, 1884, amounting to about $1,500,000,000. This fact alone shows that the great interests involved very much need some conservative regulation by law. And the men intrusted with the care and management of these great interests themselves admit the need of legislative regulation. For what are the frequent meetings of general passenger agents, convocations of general freight agents, and conferences of general managers to which I have referred but quasi-legislative bodies vainly endeavoring to do by discussion and agreement what governments do by law? And what are these vain and ineffectual efforts but so many admissions that some forceful system of regulation is the one thing most needed by the railroad corporations, to say nothing of the public interest in the case?

And here it is well to keep in mind that not the transportation question alone is involved in the railroad problem. There is the great question of the character and stability of value of the securities which the corporations have put upon the market and into the hands of the people of this country and of Europe. Here is a public consideration which it would be well for public law to have some care of. No such financial element in our national care should be wholly left to the capriciousness of managers who can not keep faith in the matter of their own agreements for thirty days at a time. The non-managing holders of railway bonds and stocks, numbering many thousands of our people, are seriously affected by the instability of the system of management which disturbs their investments; and whatsoever affects them in this respect reaches over and touches the general public interests, and often unsettles the entire business interests of the country. It was a railway-security brick that started the whole business row to tumbling in 1873.
